Big SPIKE and Little TYKE

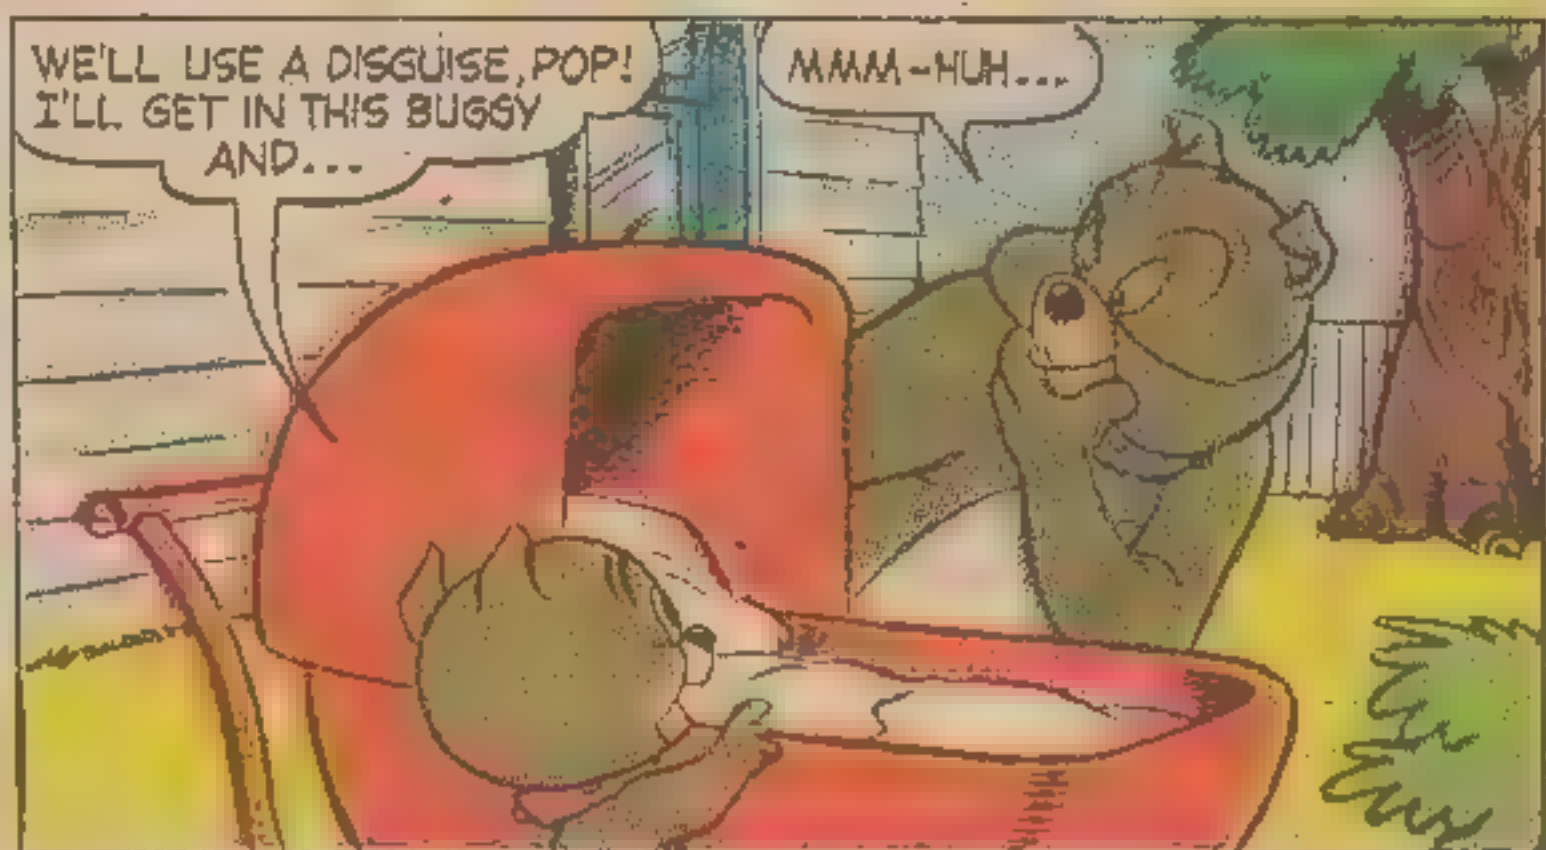

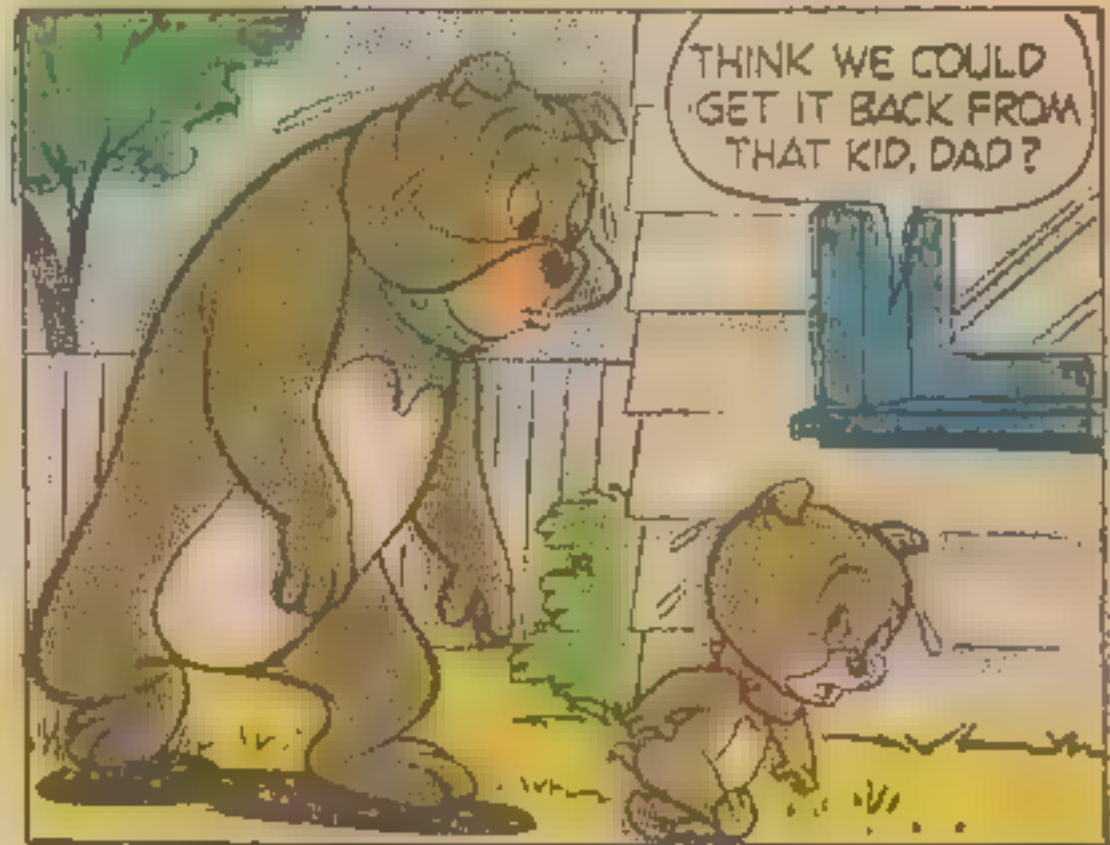

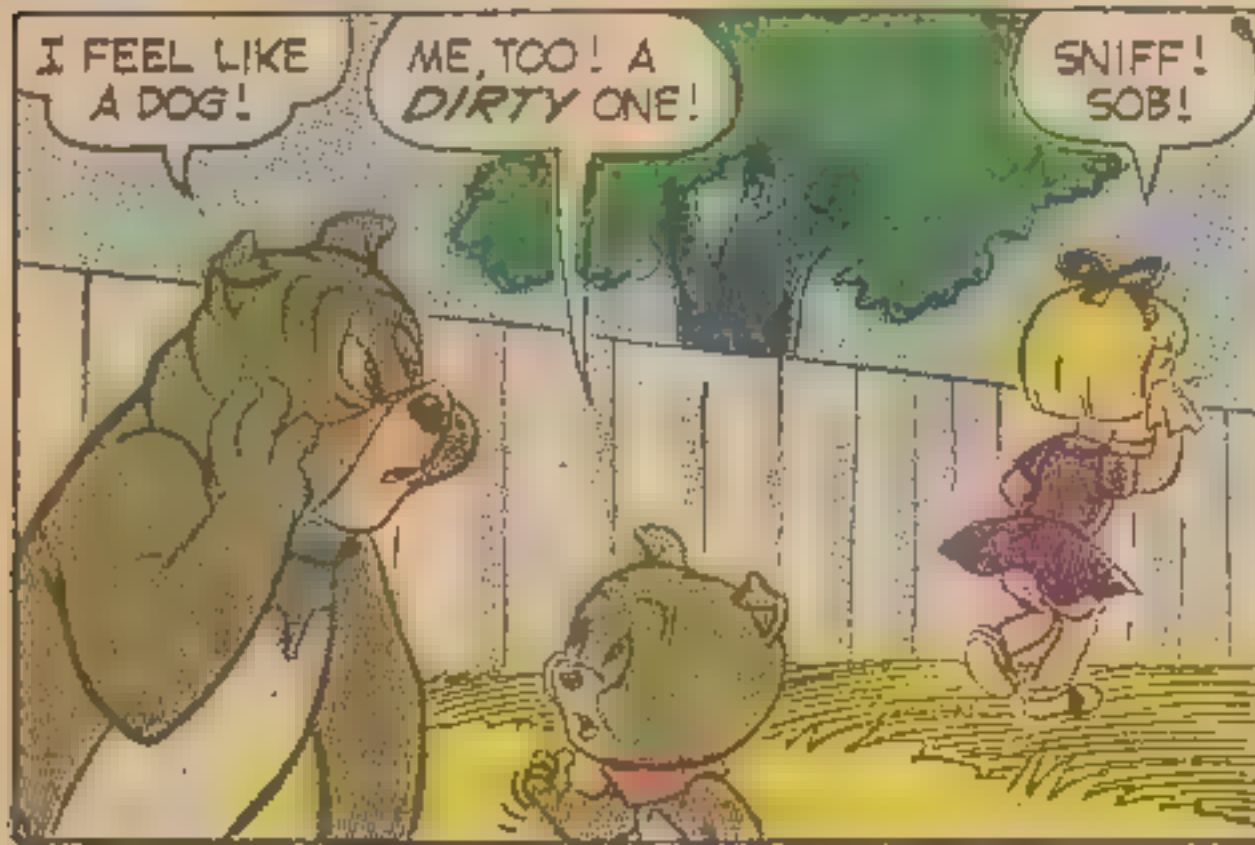

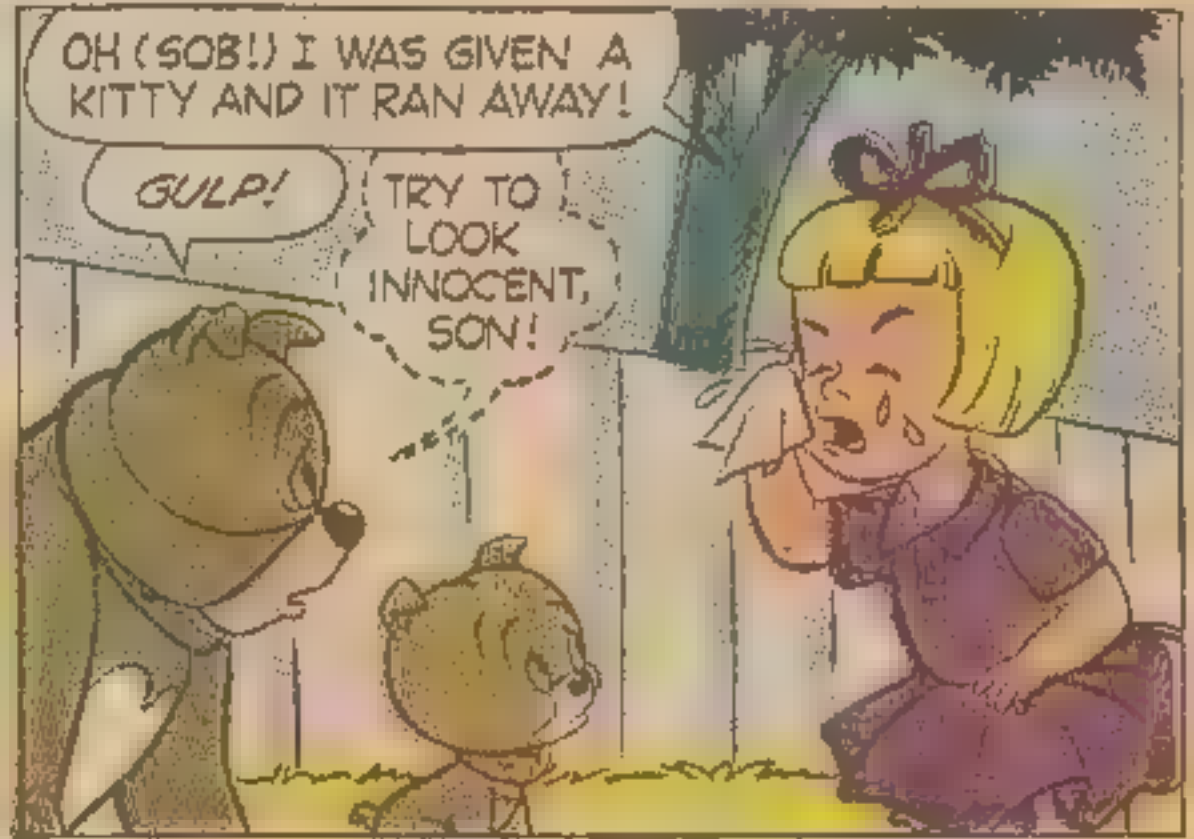

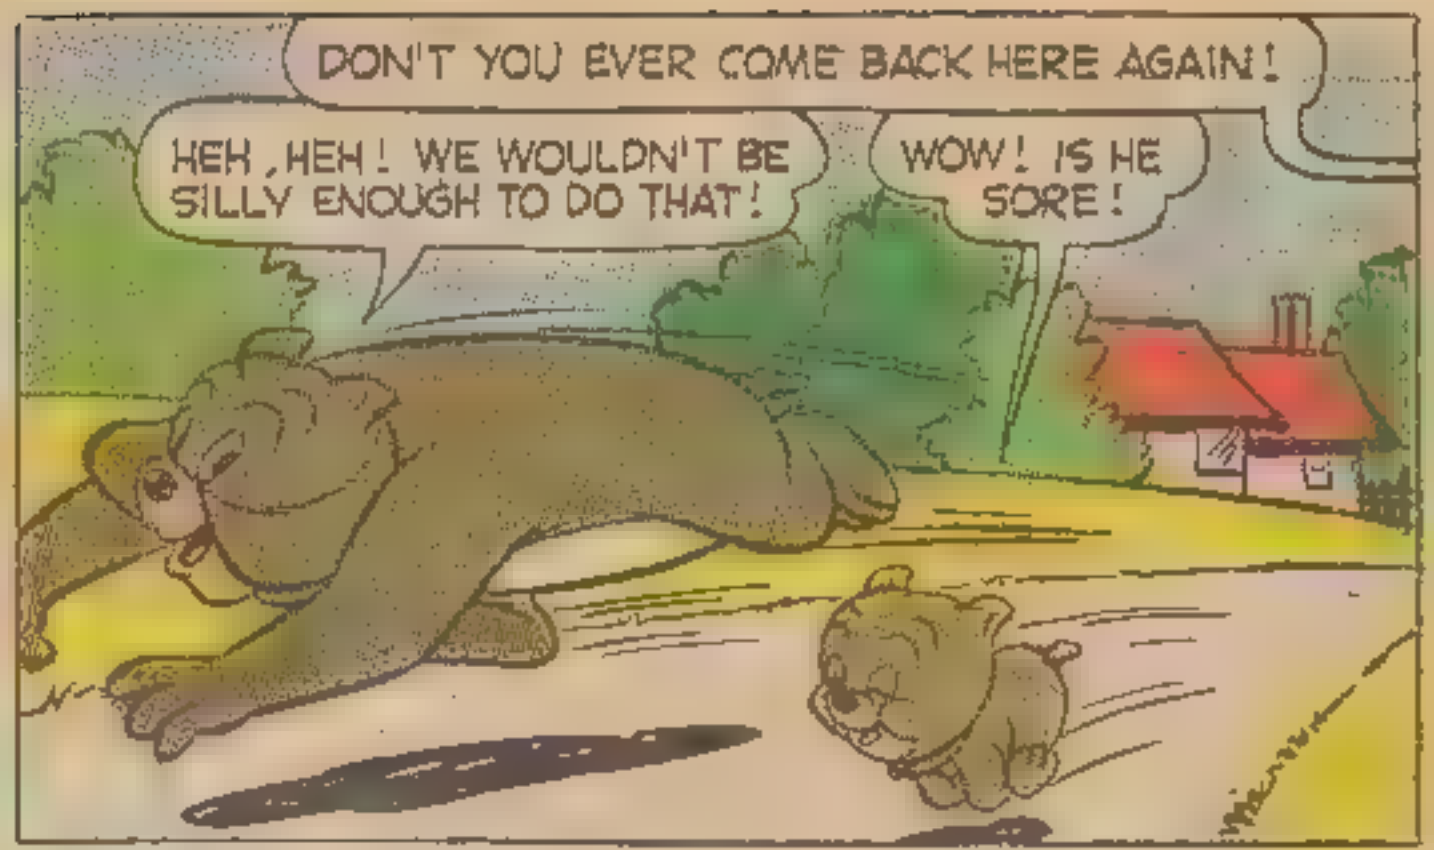

OKAY, GANG—RIGHT AFTER LUNCH WE MEET HERE!

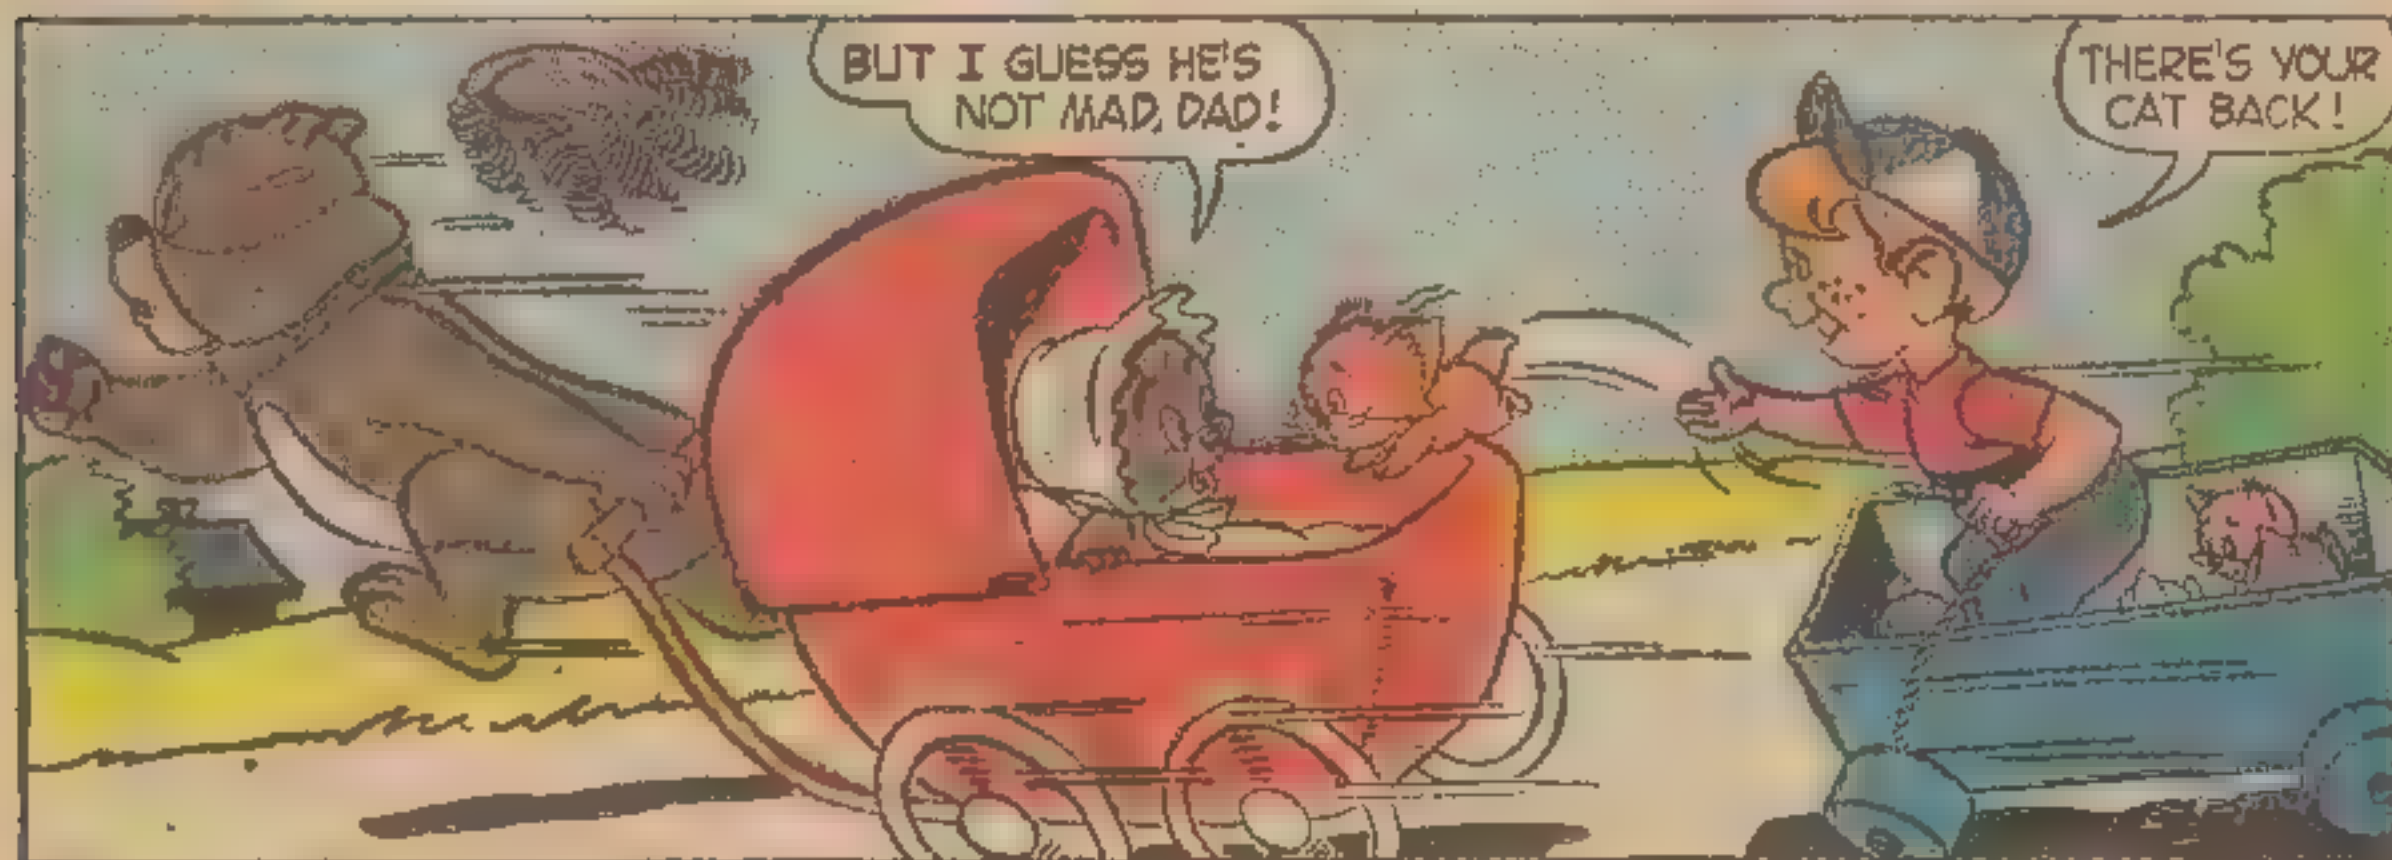

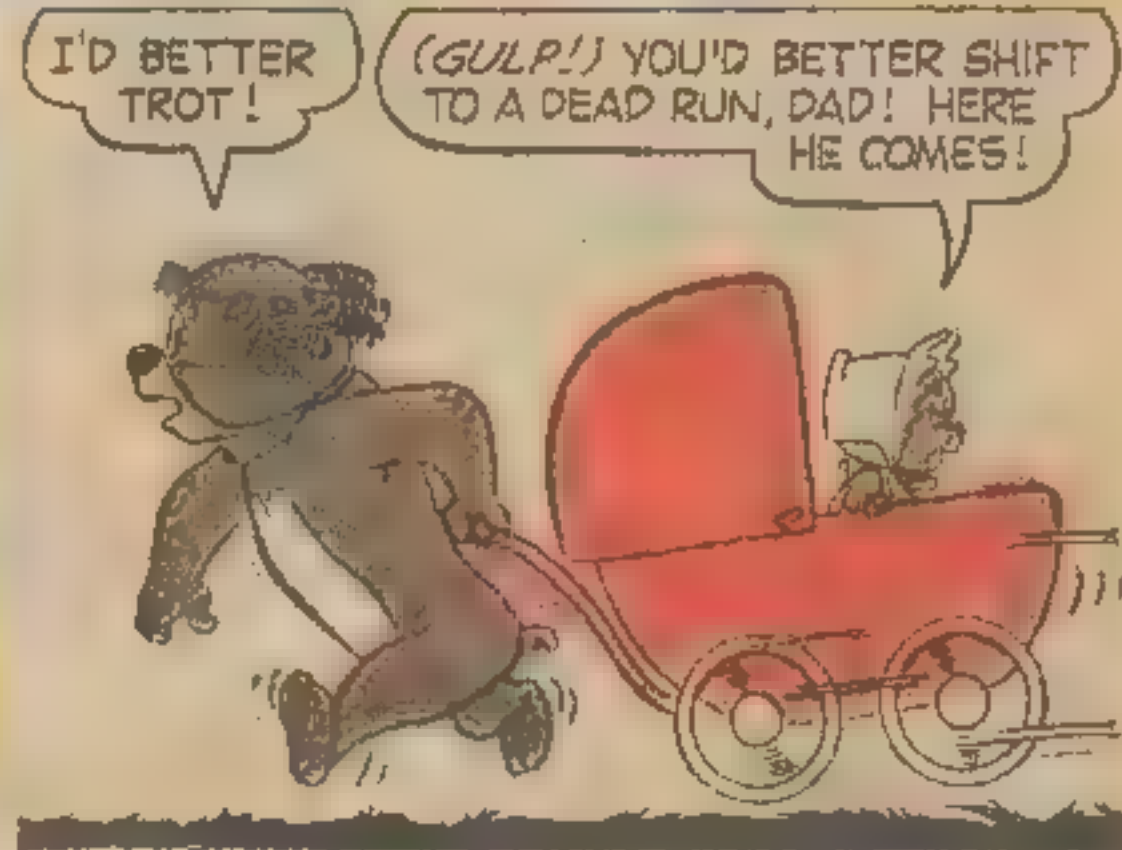

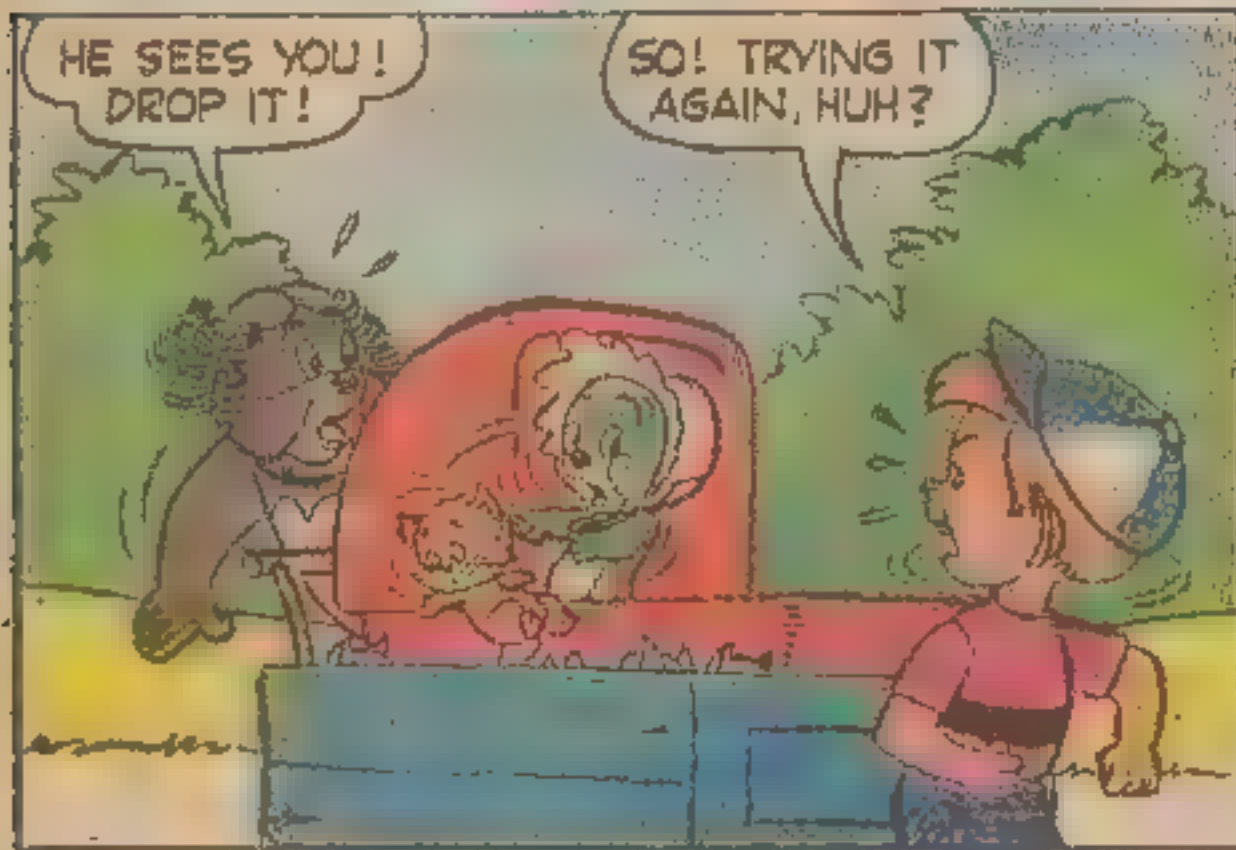

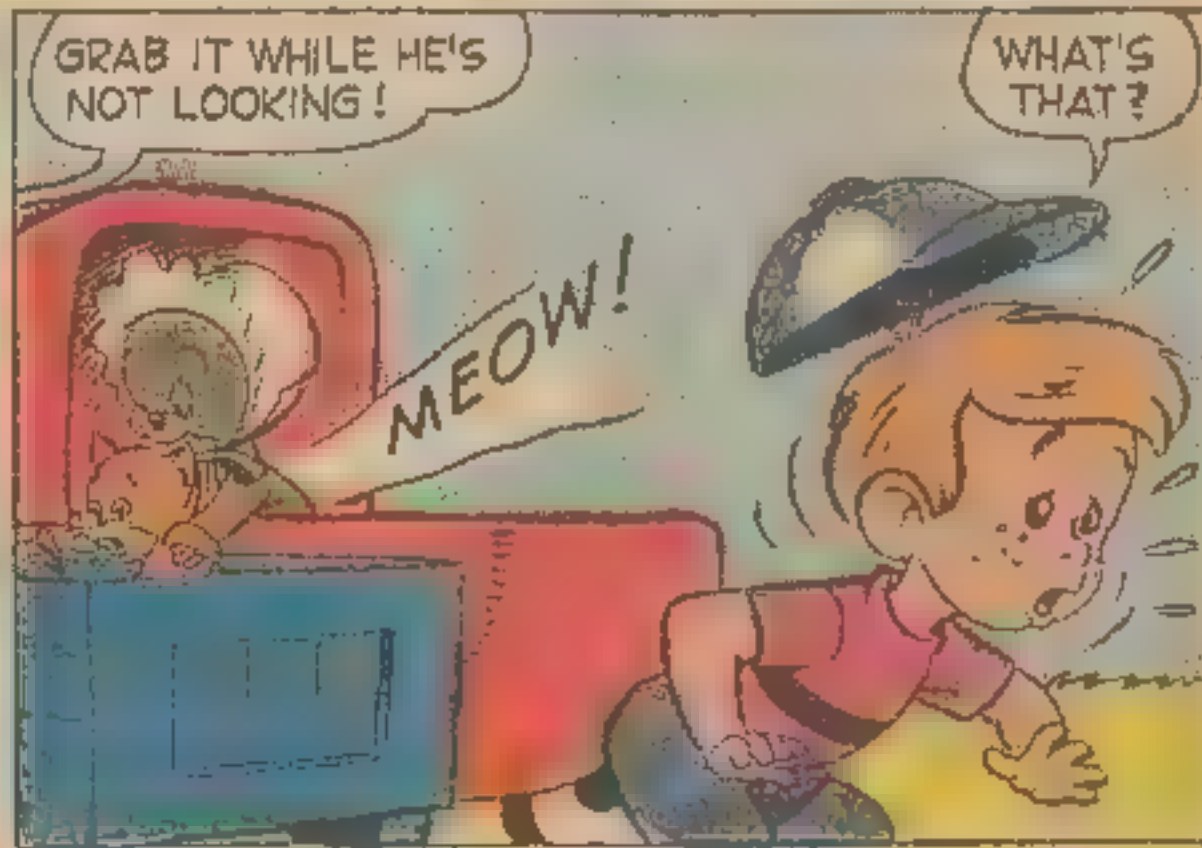

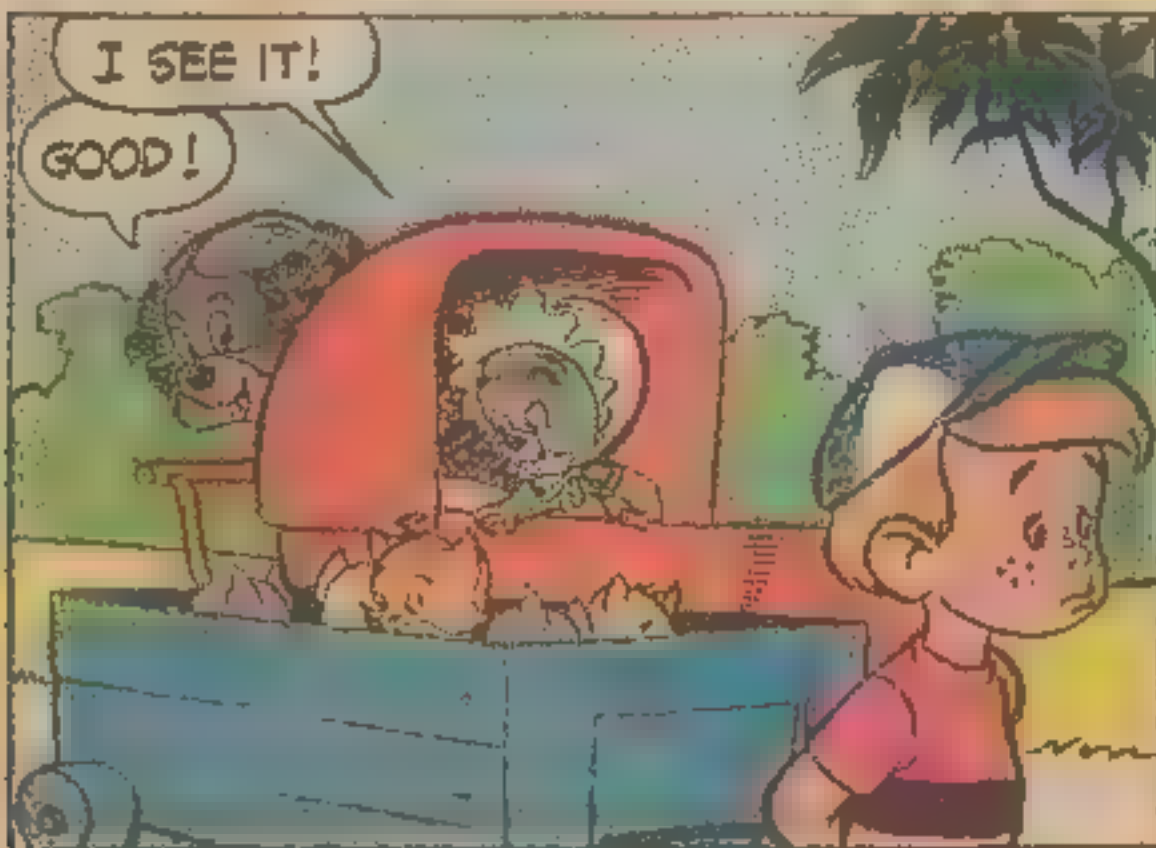

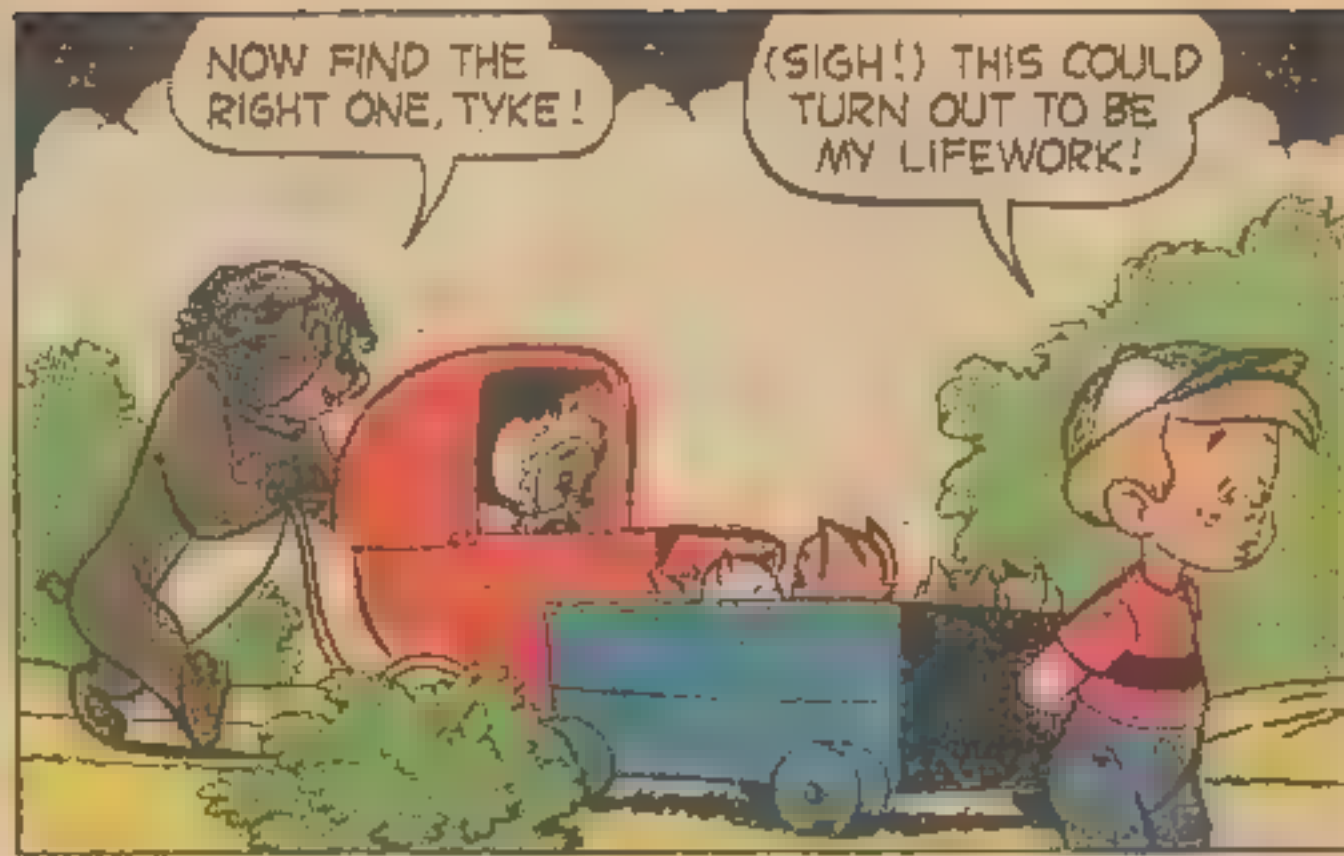

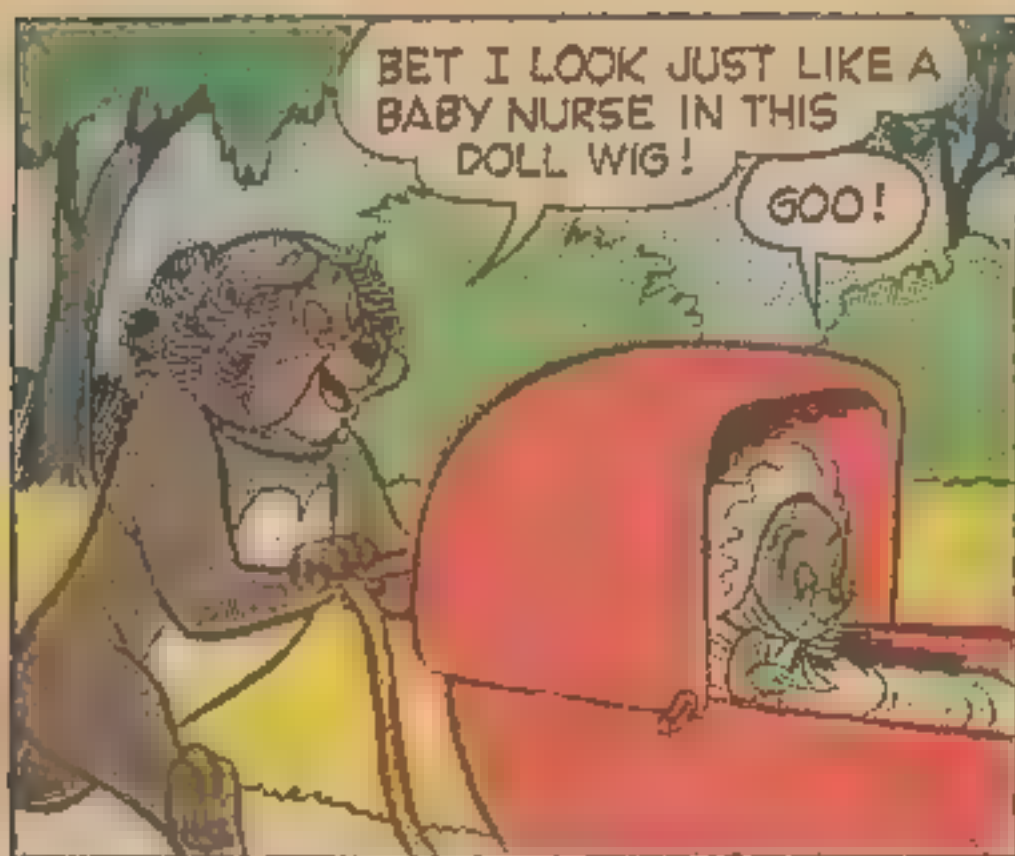

AND THEN WE TOUR THE TOWN, HUH?

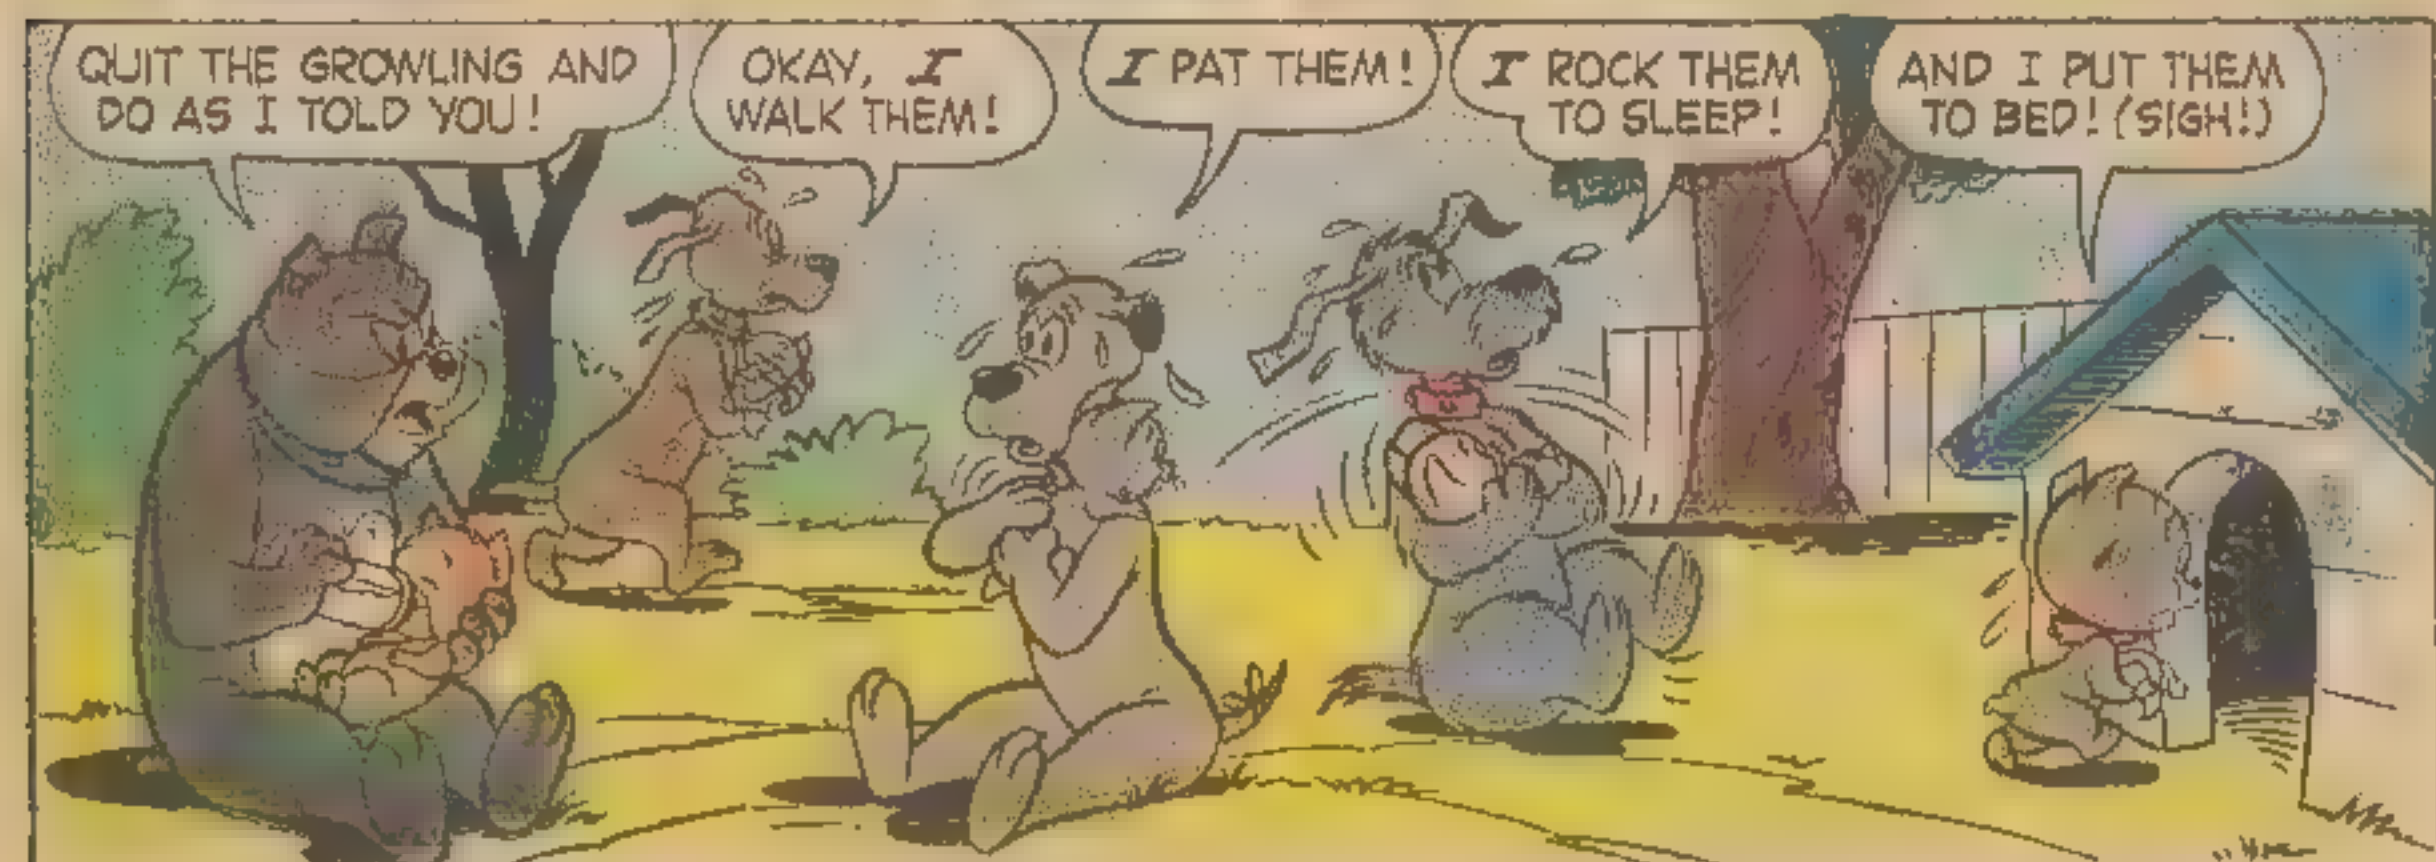

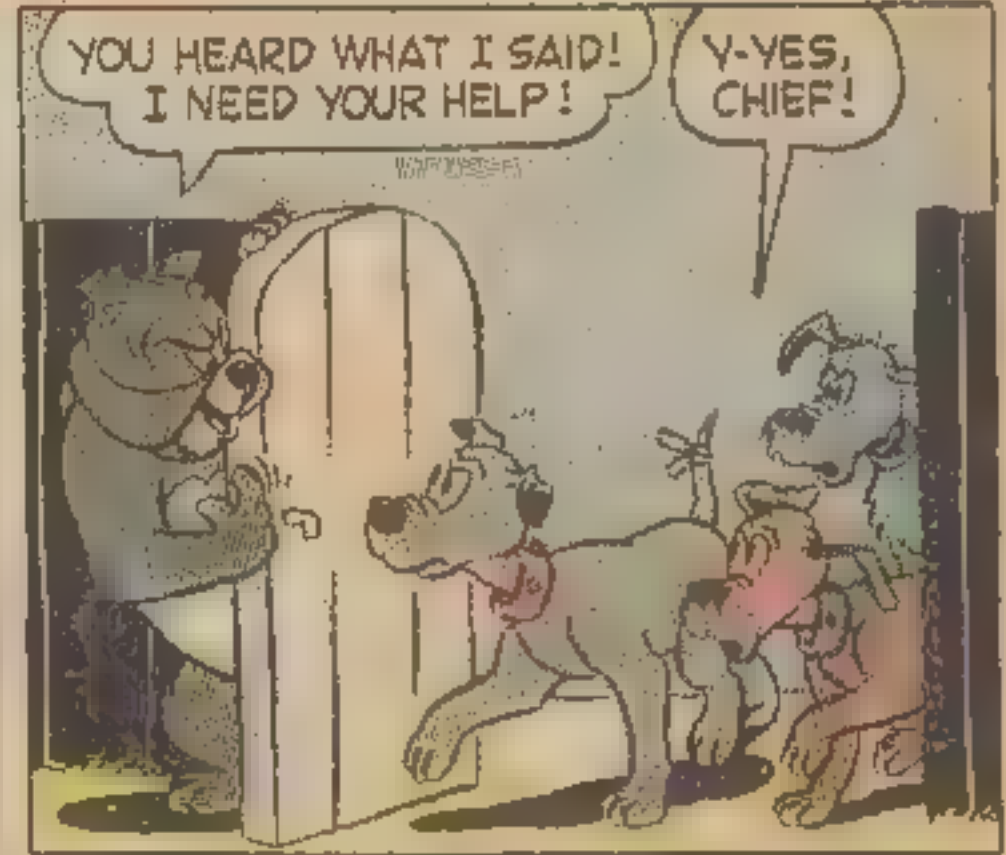

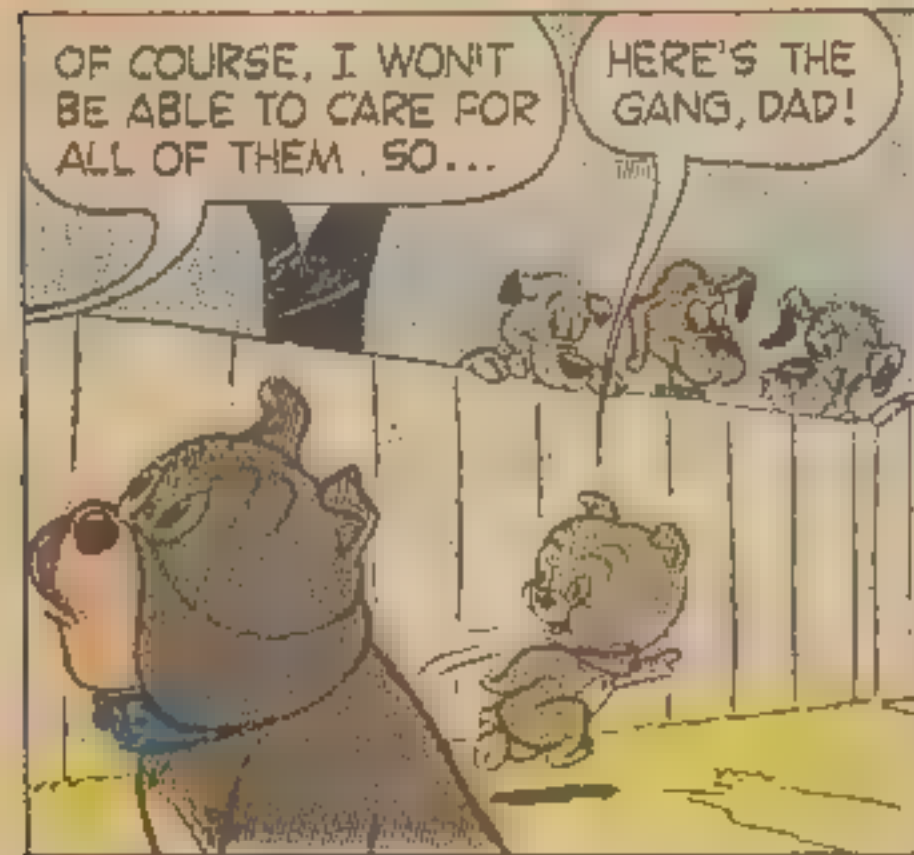

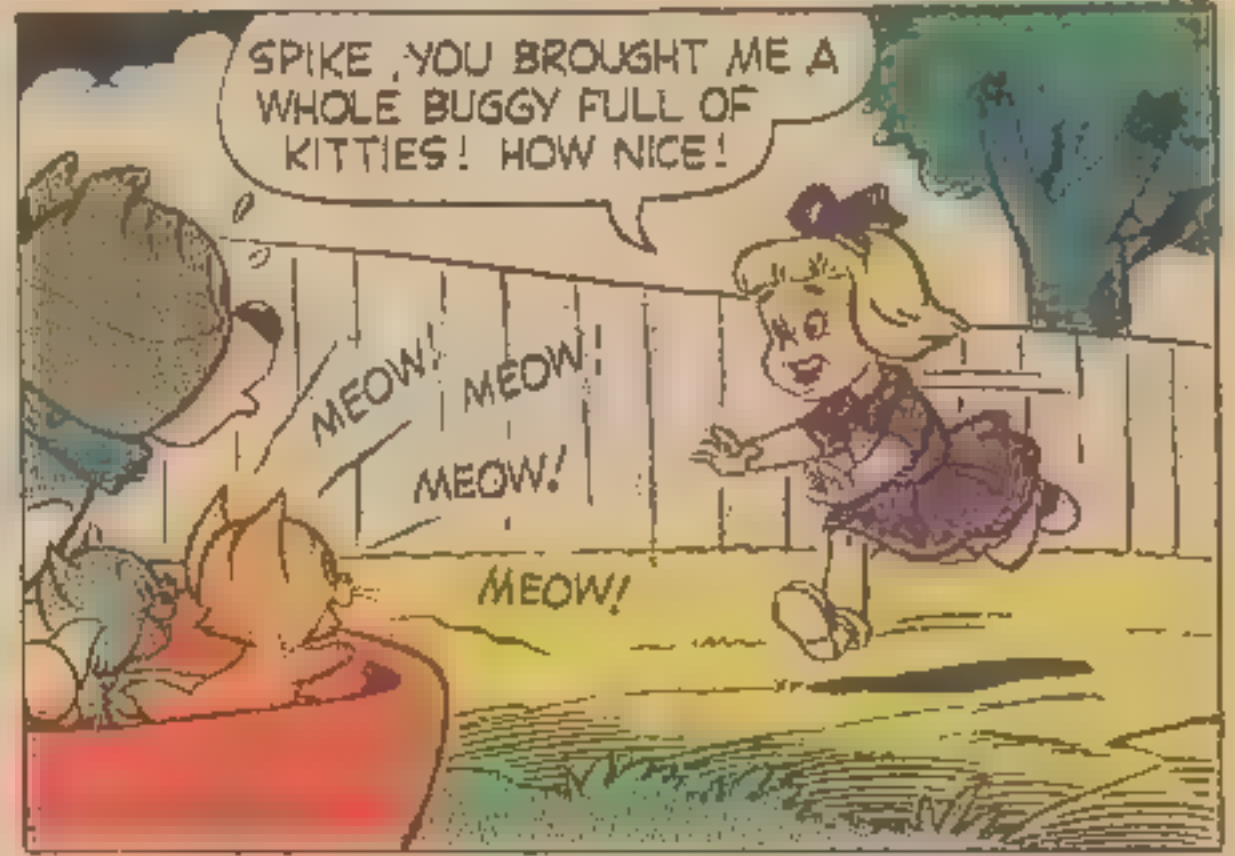

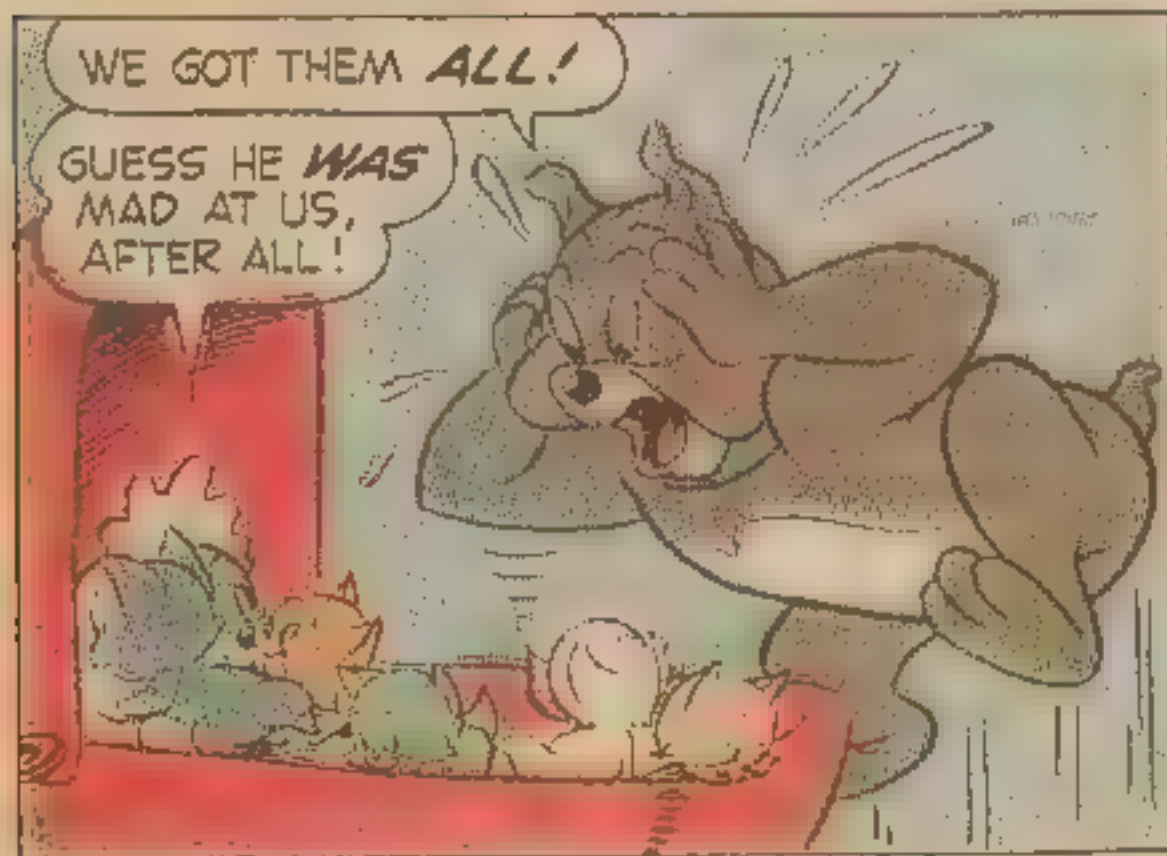

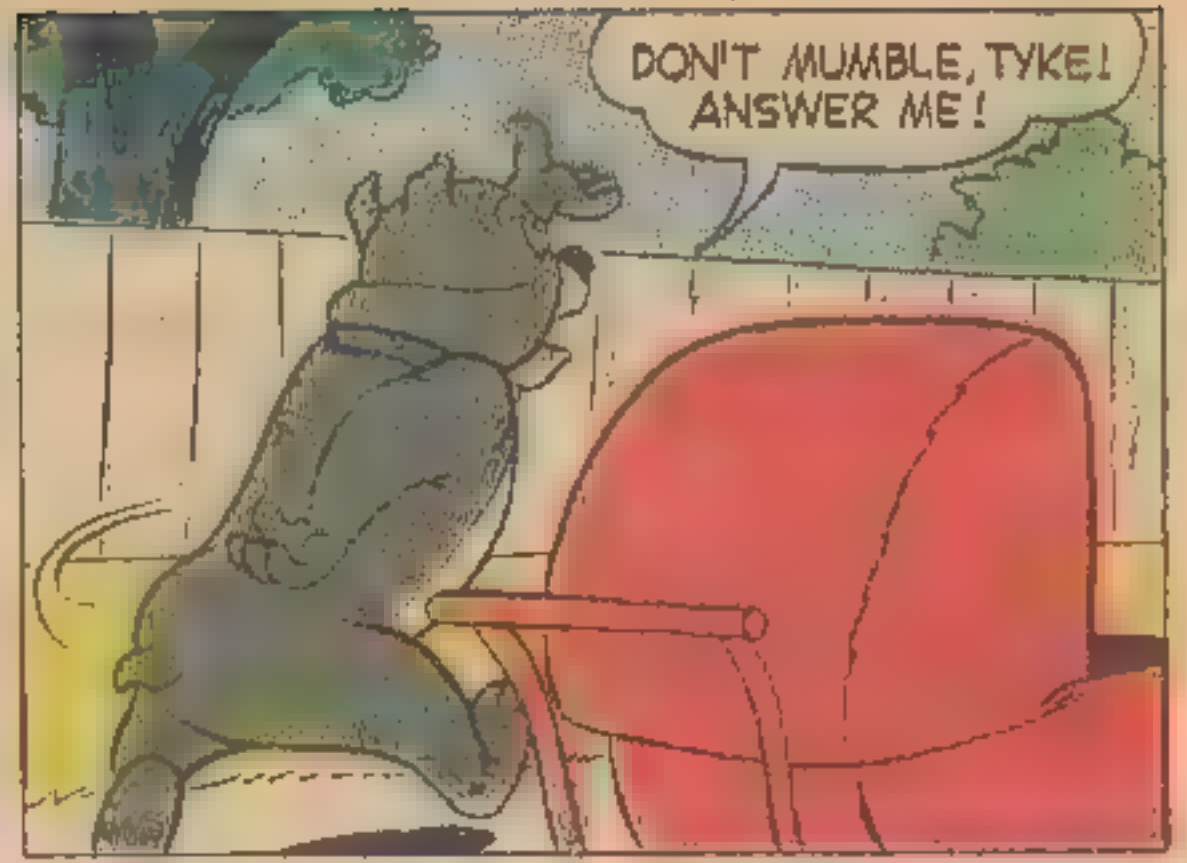

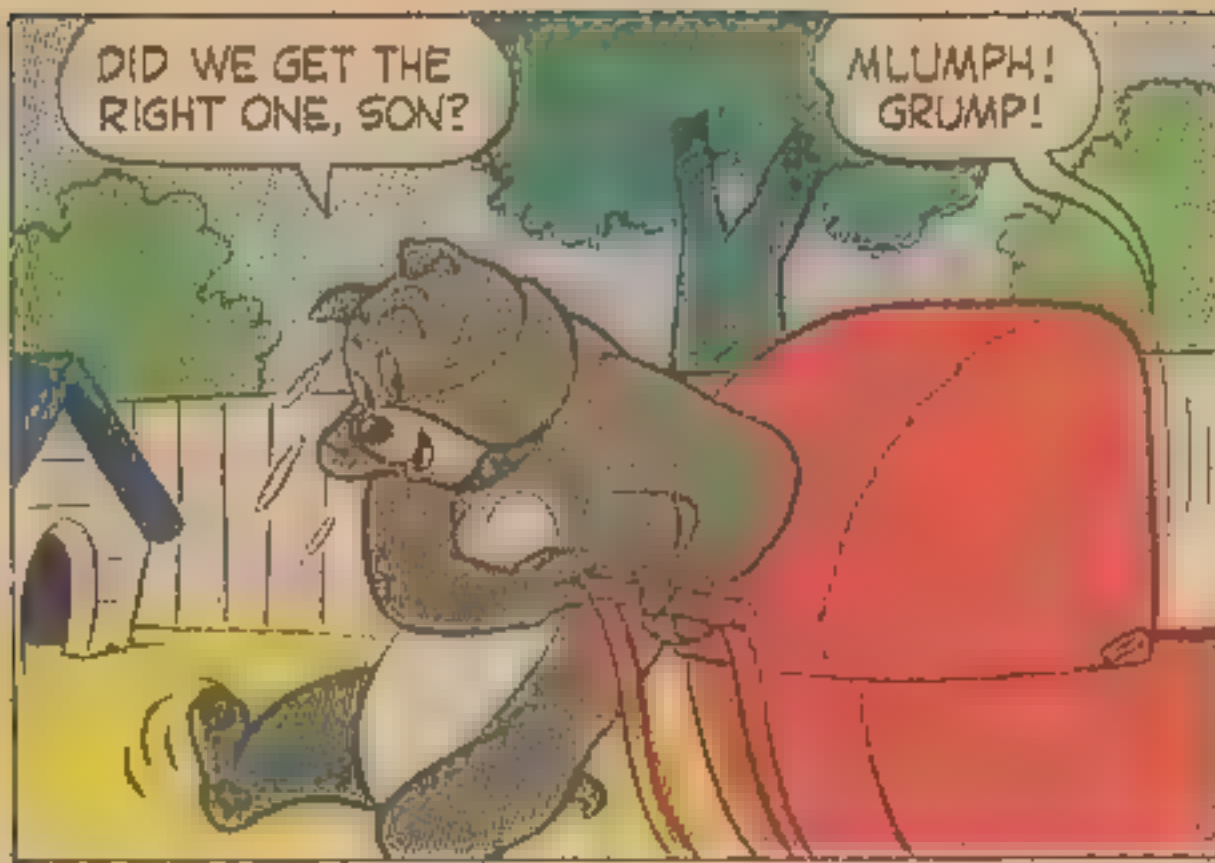

YEAH—WE'LL TIP OVER GARBAGE CANS AND STUFF!

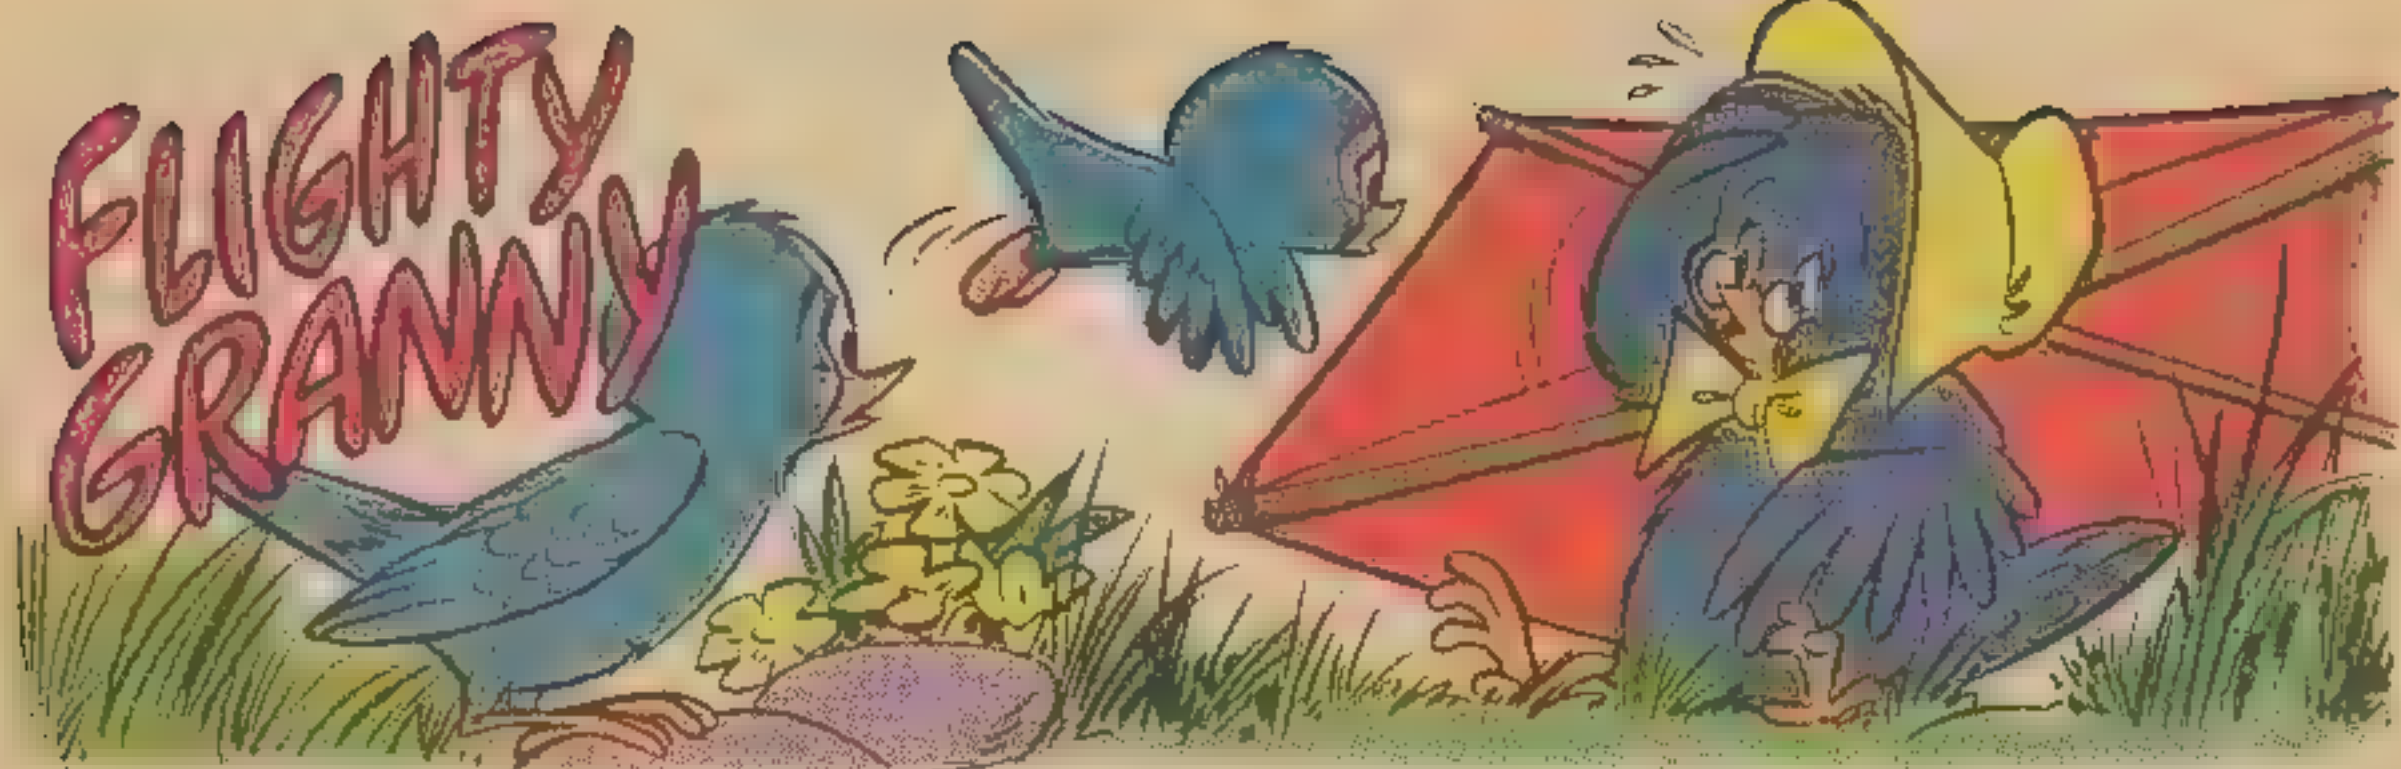

"Now remember, children," Mother Bird told Bertie Bird and Brother Billie one fine day as they perched on the tree branch that held their nest-home in Apple Tree Lane, "Grandma Bird gets dizzy if she flies too high in the air. So while she's here, try to keep her close to the ground. Grandma's so frisky, she's apt to forget her age."

Bertie Bird hopped up and down happily. "Grandma's fun," he chirped. "Even if we're grounded, I'll bet we have a fine time."

Billie eyed him suspiciously. "None of your tricks now. If I have to keep an eye on both you and Grandma, I'll really have my work cut out for me!"

"Twitter-dee-dee, twitter-dee-dee," Grandma Bird chirped, fluttering out of the nest. "Are you children ready to show your Granny the sights?"

"Sure we are," Bertie cried excitedly. "Can you hop to the ground, Granny?"

Grandma Bird laughed. "Going down is easy," she said as she sailed downward and landed with a little plop in the soft dirt. "And away we go!"

"Be careful now," Mother Bird cautioned as Bertie and Billie joined Grandma Bird on the ground. "Take it easy."

"We will!" Billie said firmly.

"Would you like to go to the park, Granny?" Bertie Bird chirped. "It's not far and we can fly low all the way."

"Fine," Grandma exclaimed. And she sailed ahead full speed.

"My goodness," Bertie panted, catching up with her. "You're fast!"

"There's life in the old bird yet," Grandma chortled. "Hurry, Billie!"

Billie caught up with them at the gate to the park. He was breathing hard and he looked cross. "What a pair!" he groaned.

"My, the park is pretty," Grandma said. "What's that bright red thing on the grass?"

She flitted over, hopped upon the colorful, diamond-shaped object, and began to peck at a string that was attached to it.

"Get away from there, Grannyl!" Billy yelled. "That is a kite!"

Just then, someone pulled the string and the bright red paper fluttered upward carrying Grandma Bird with it.

"Whee!" Grandma cried. "This is fun. Come on, children, try it. Twitter-dee-dee!"

Bertie Bird happily sailed up and landed beside her. As the kite bounced upward, he bounced with it, beaming his joy. "It's all right, Billie," he called to his brother. "We can always fly off when we want to."

"Of course we can," Granny cried. "Twitter-dee-dee, this is the life."

Suddenly, the kite shot up higher with terrific speed. "Better fly off now, Grannyl," Bertie shouted.

But Granny just clutched the kite and swayed from side to side. Her eyes were shut and she was too dizzy to move.

Billie saw her predicament and yelled, "Come on, Bertie. Maybe if we both pull, we can get the kite down to the ground."

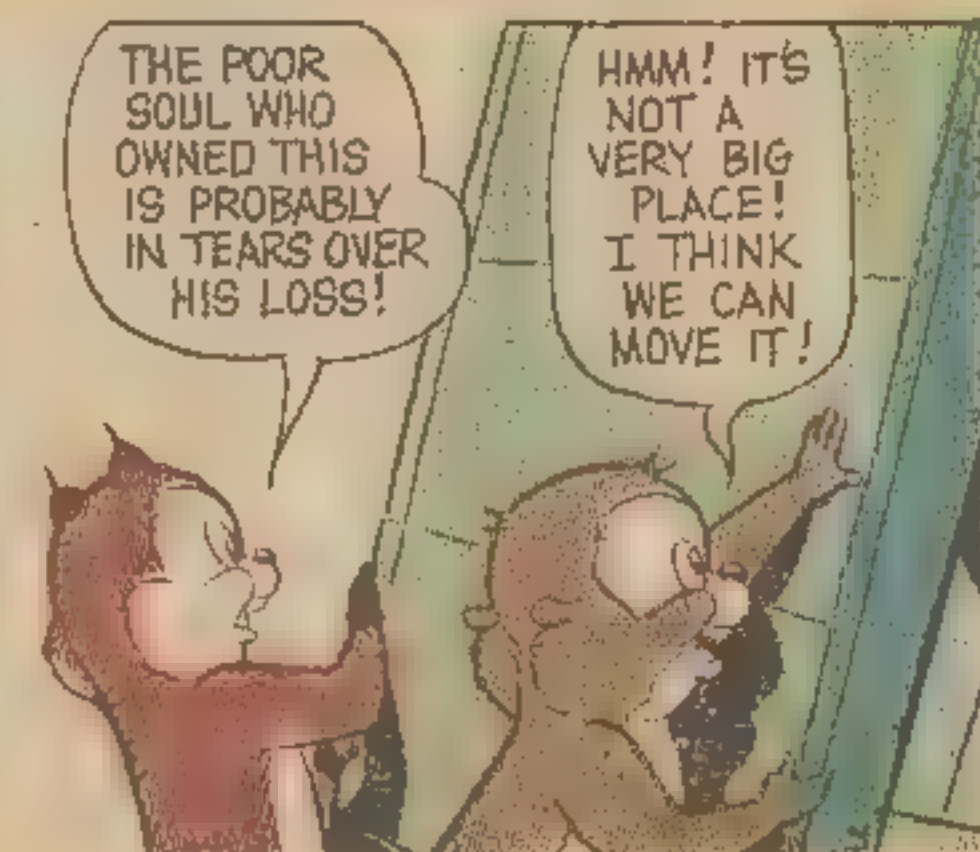

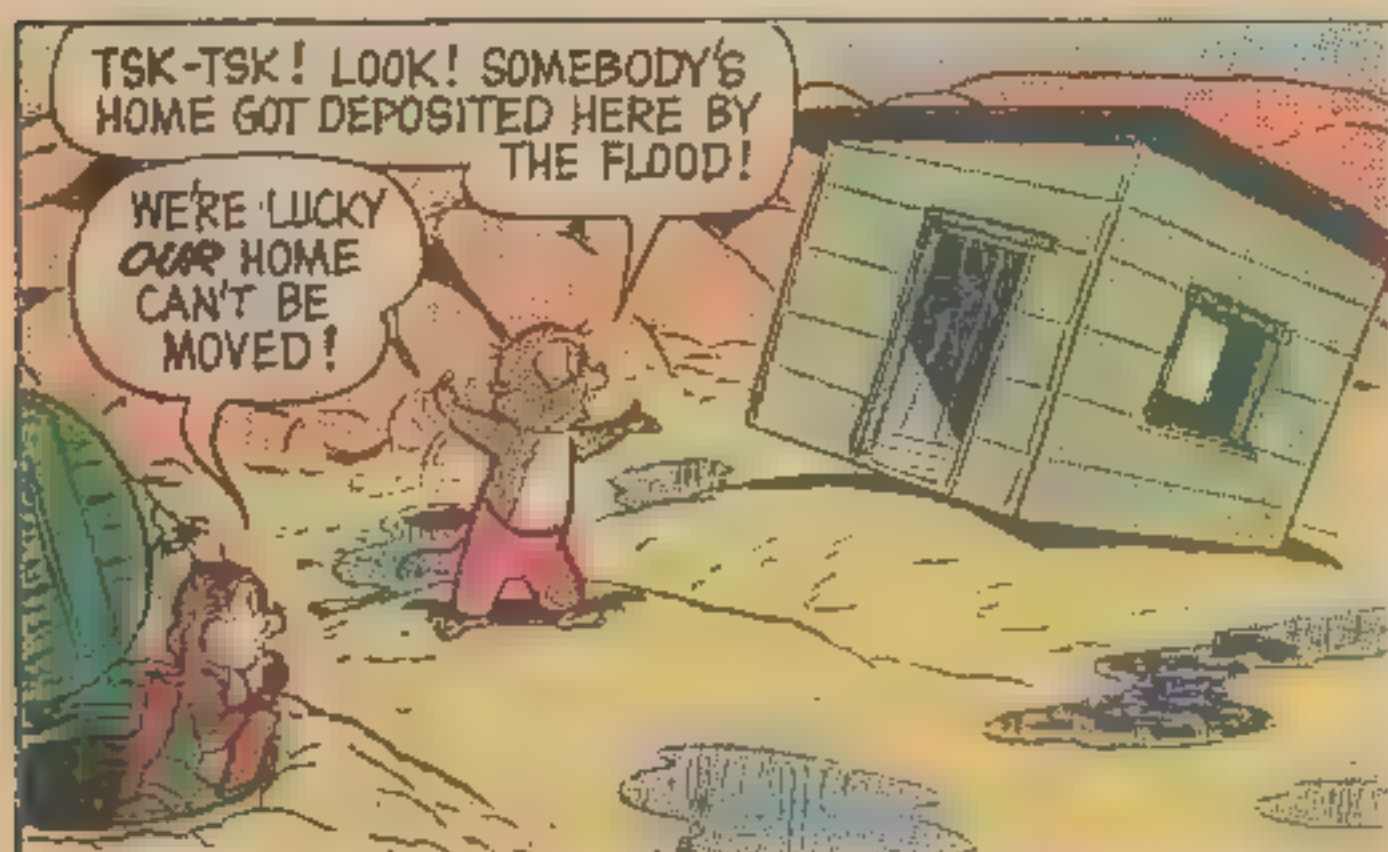

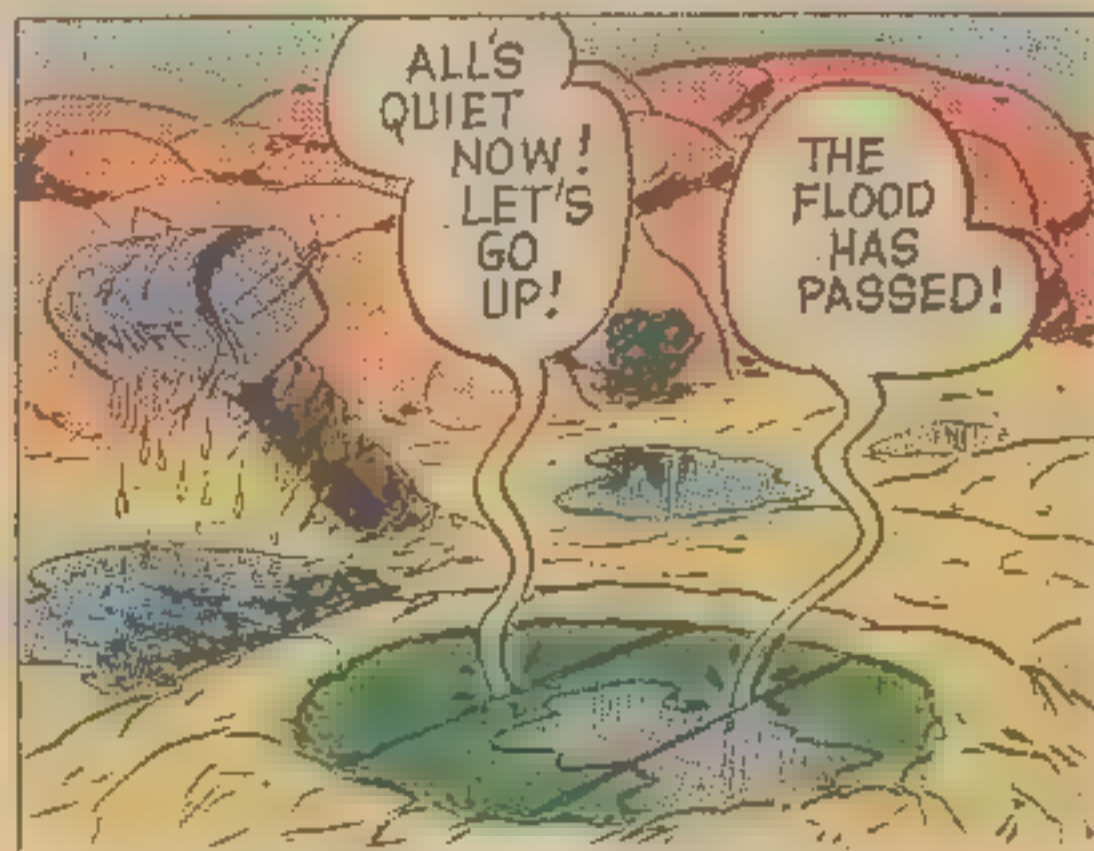

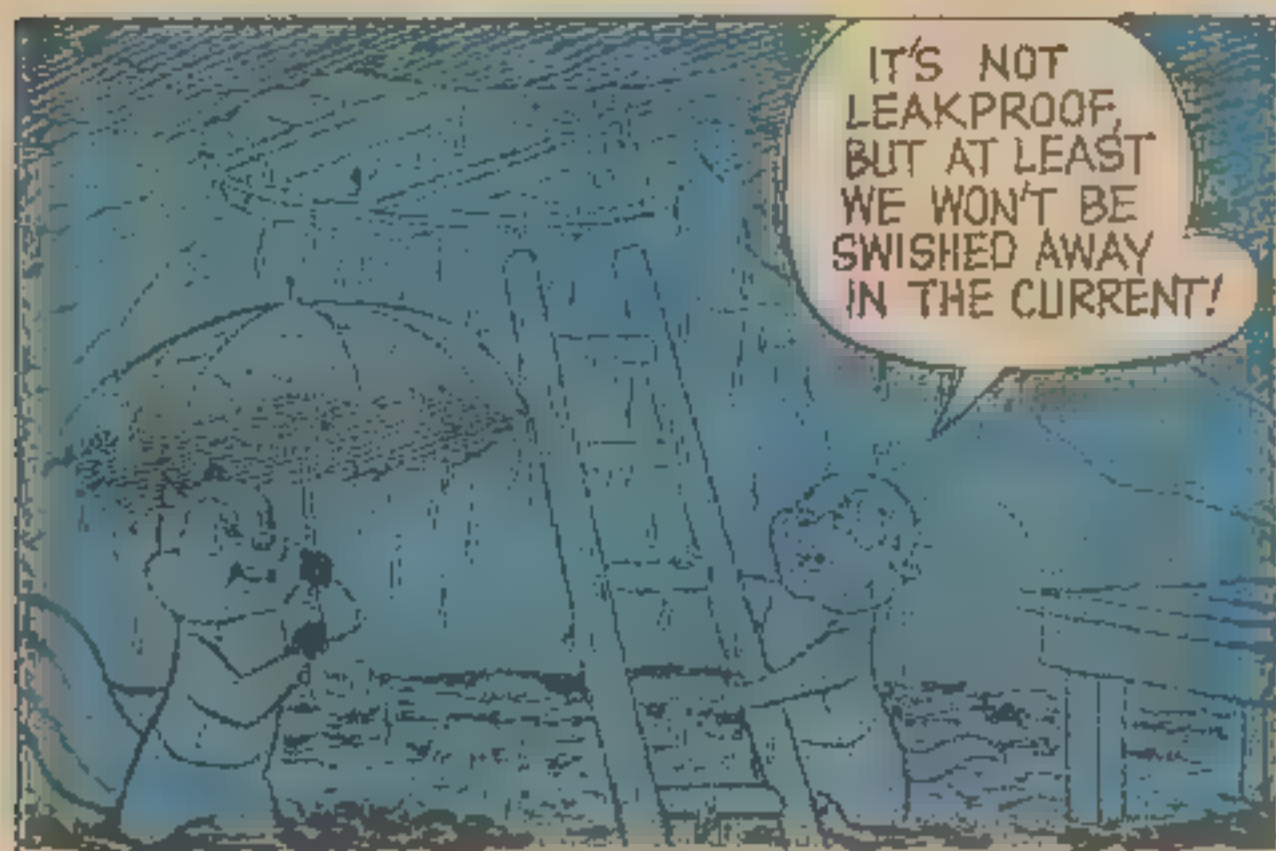

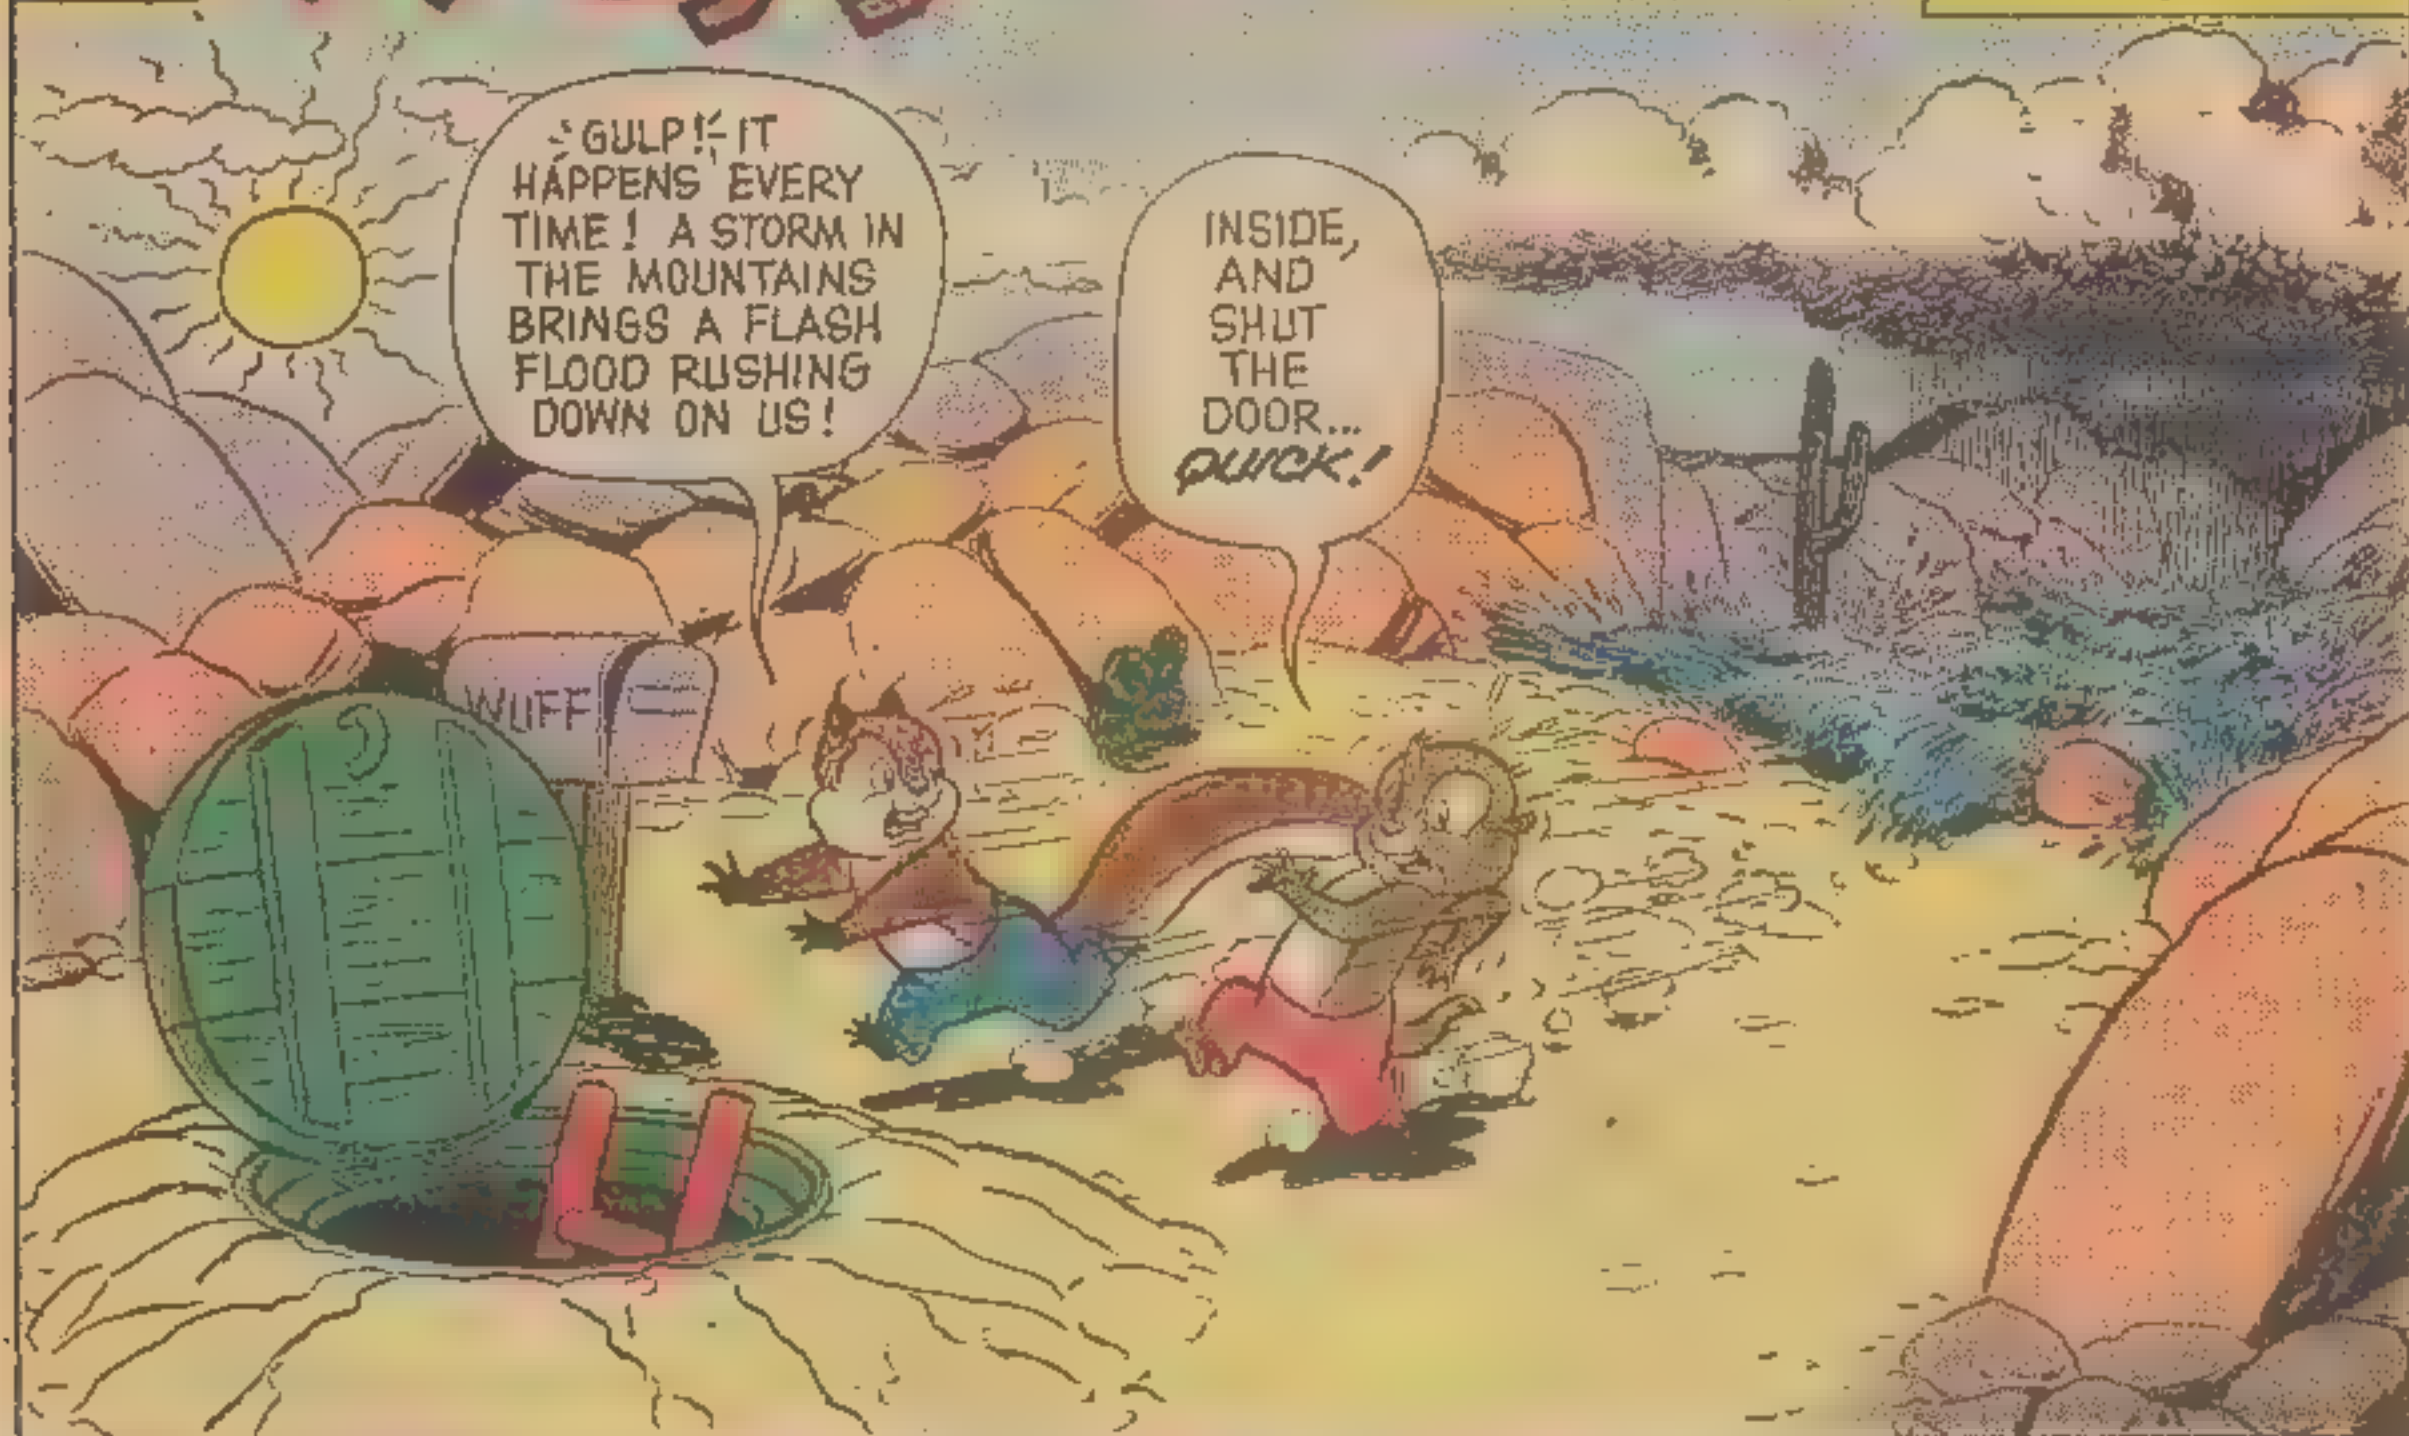

Together, the two brothers pulled and tugged on the string. Finally, the kite fluttered to earth and grandma hopped off.

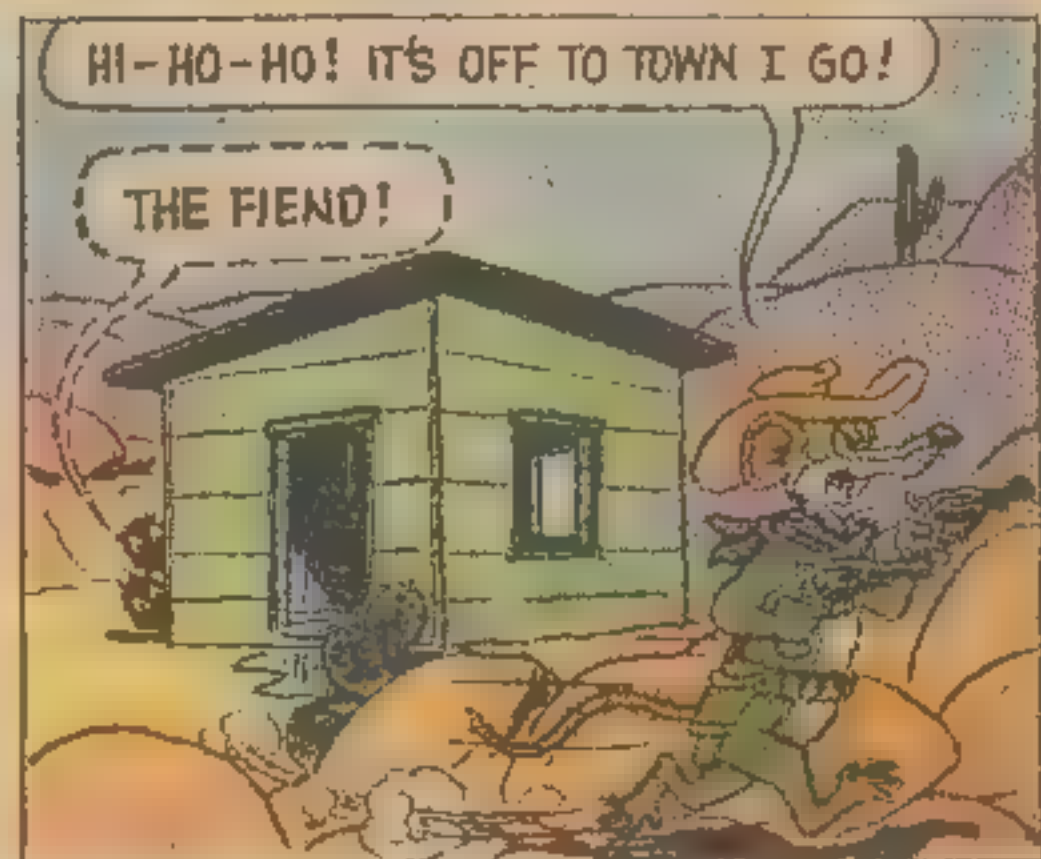

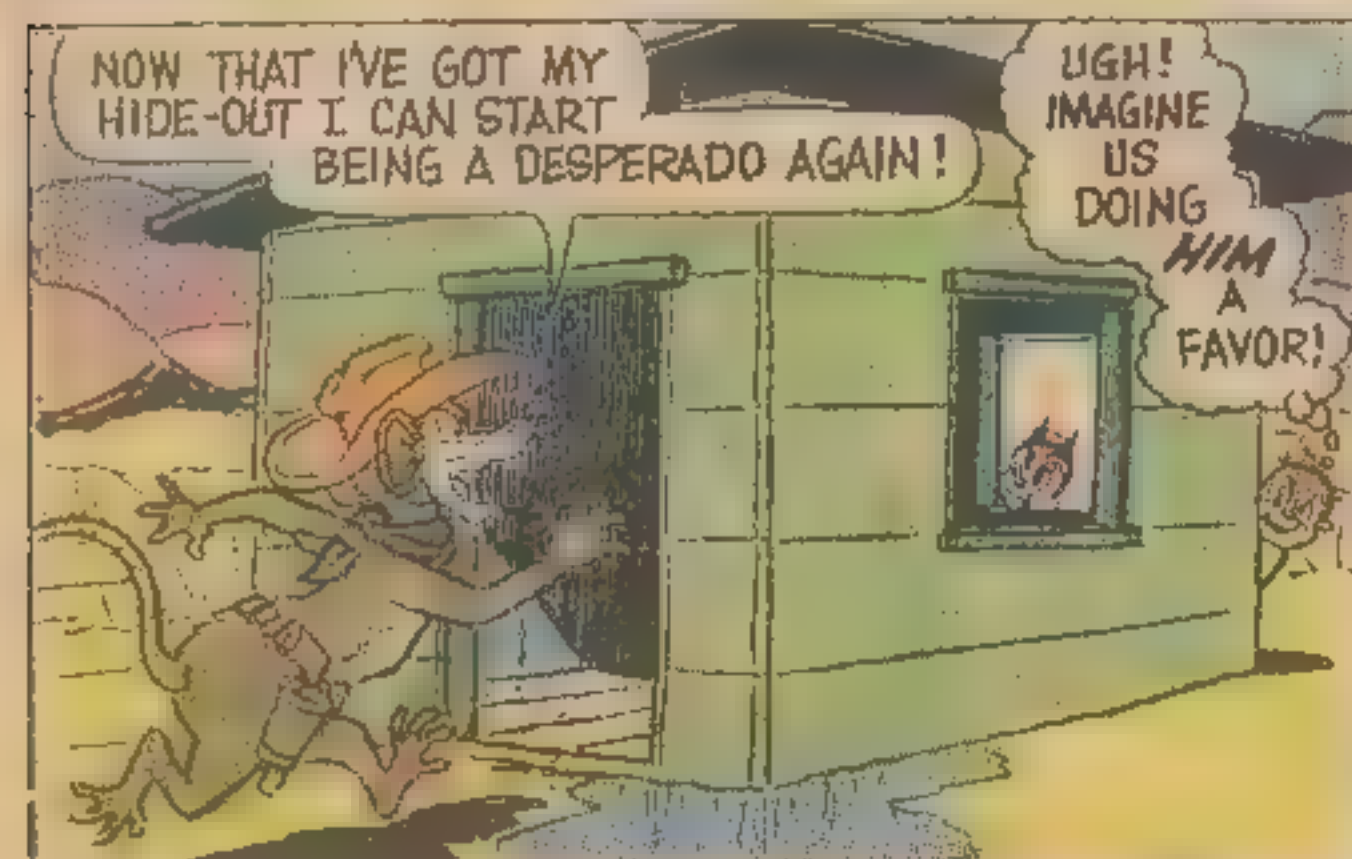

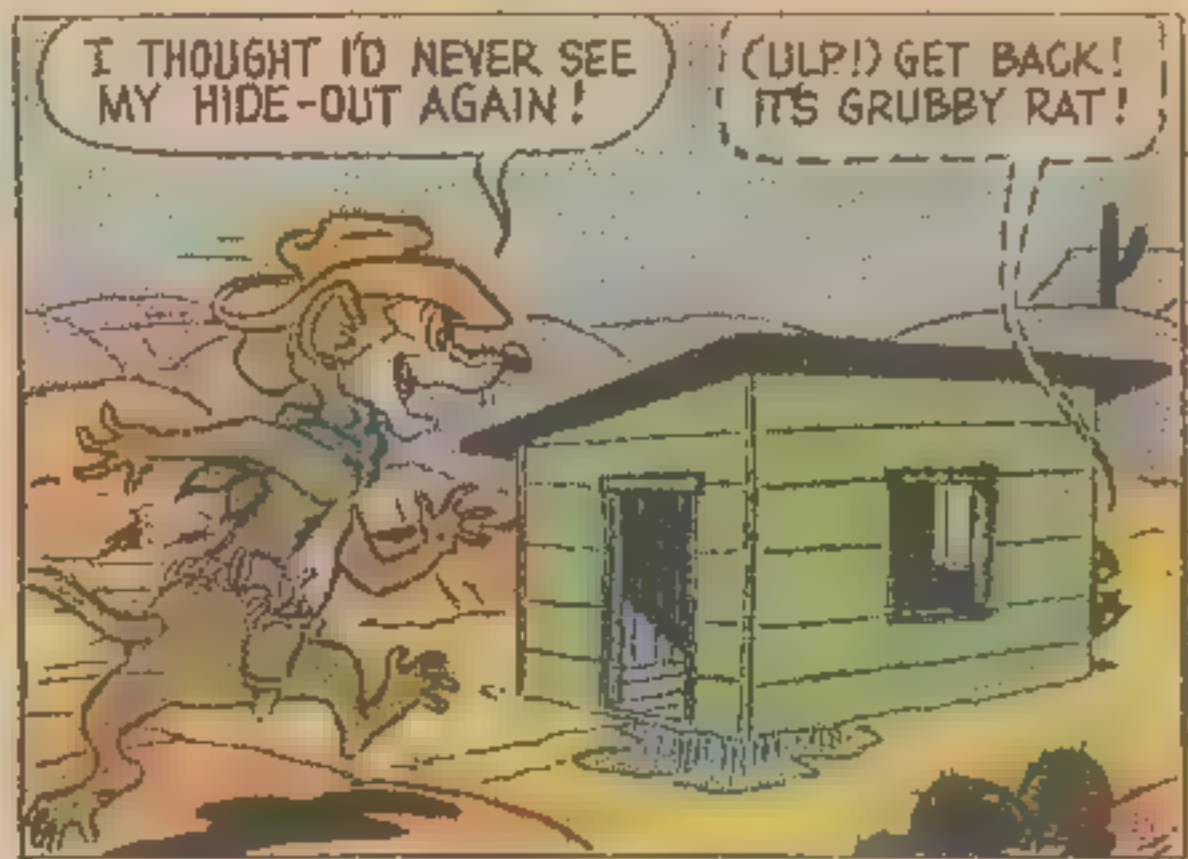

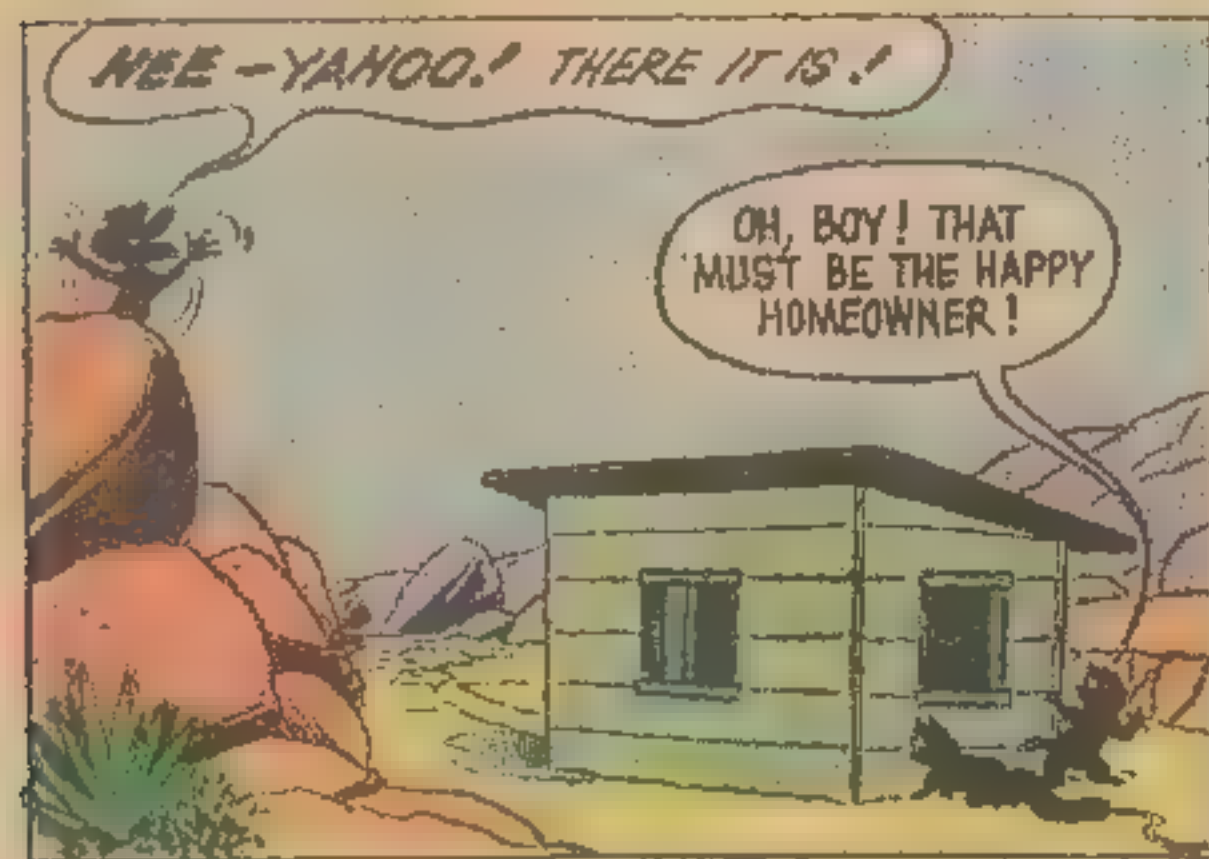

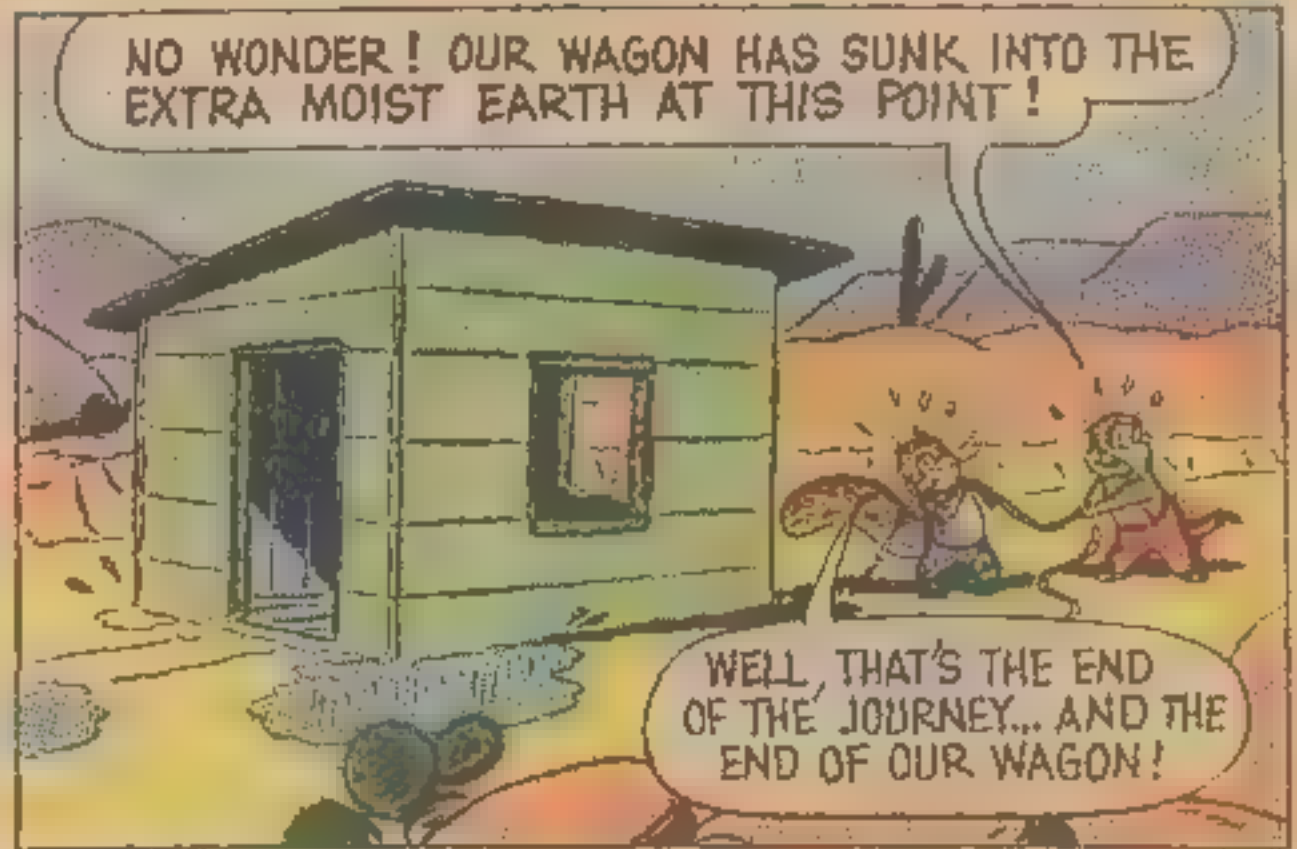

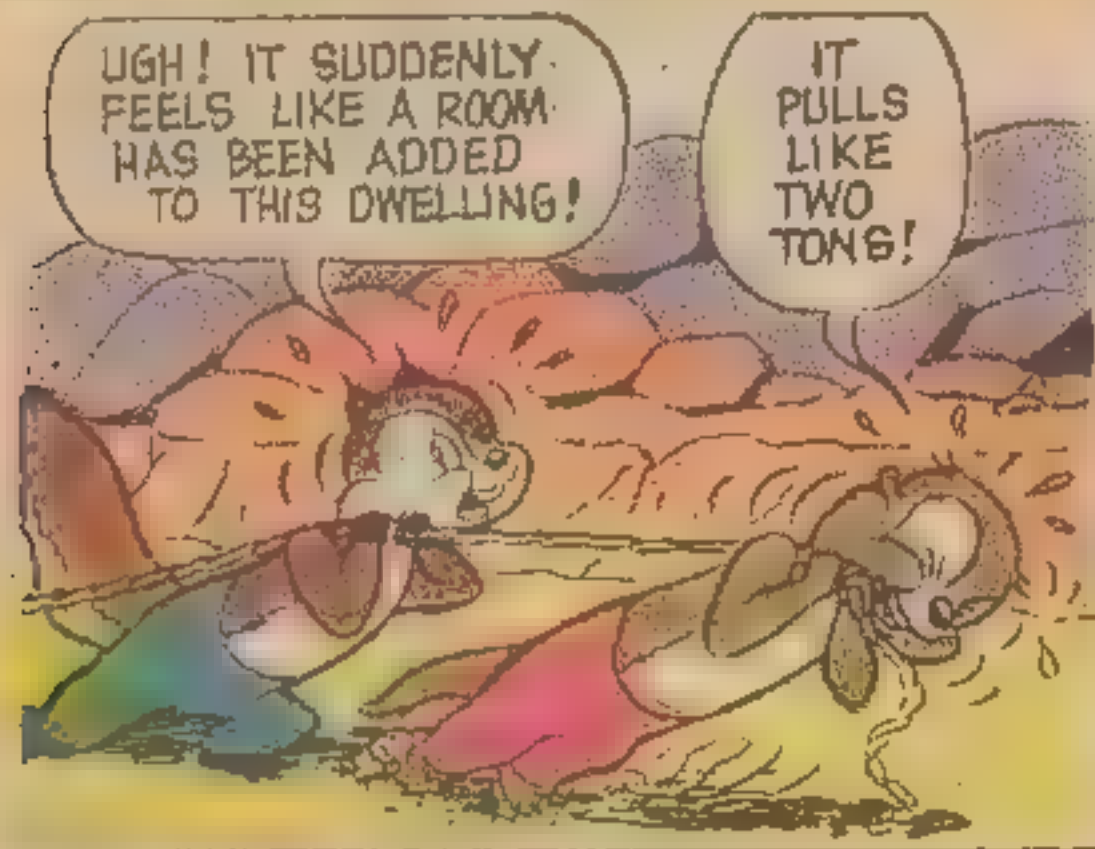

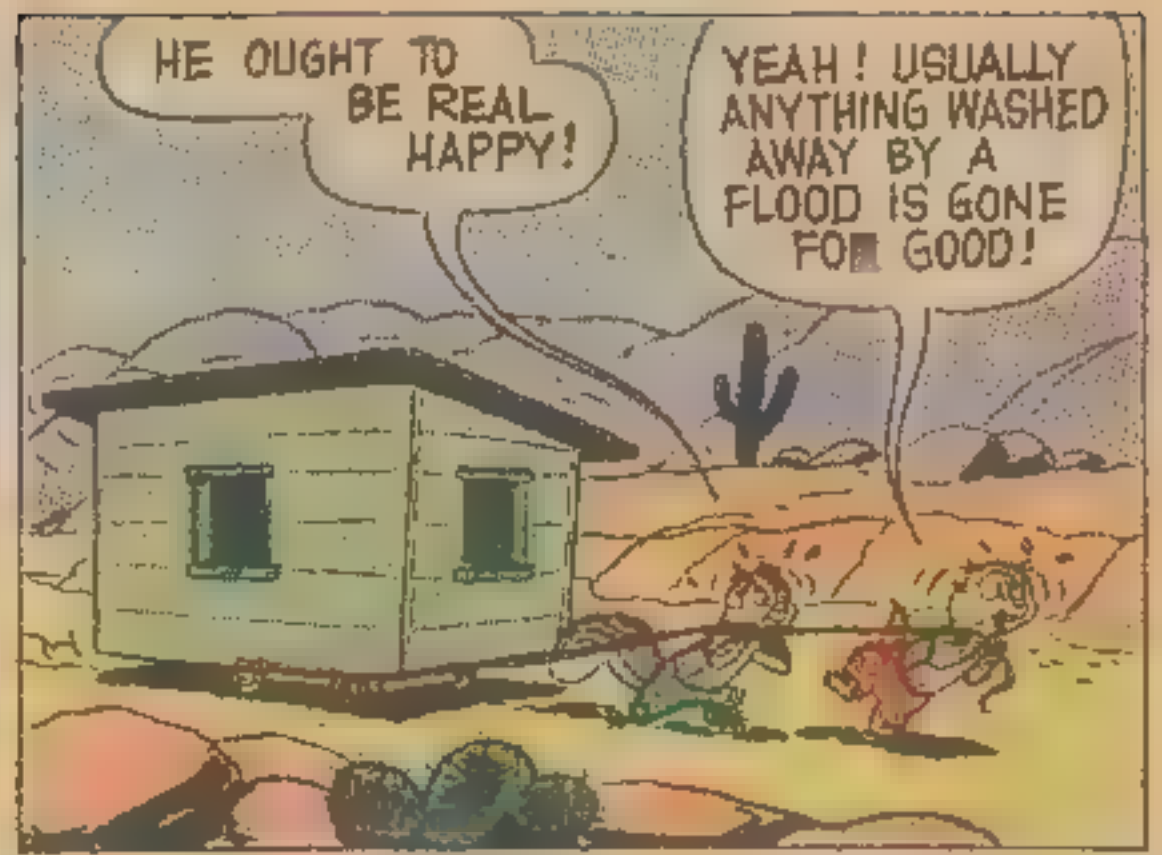

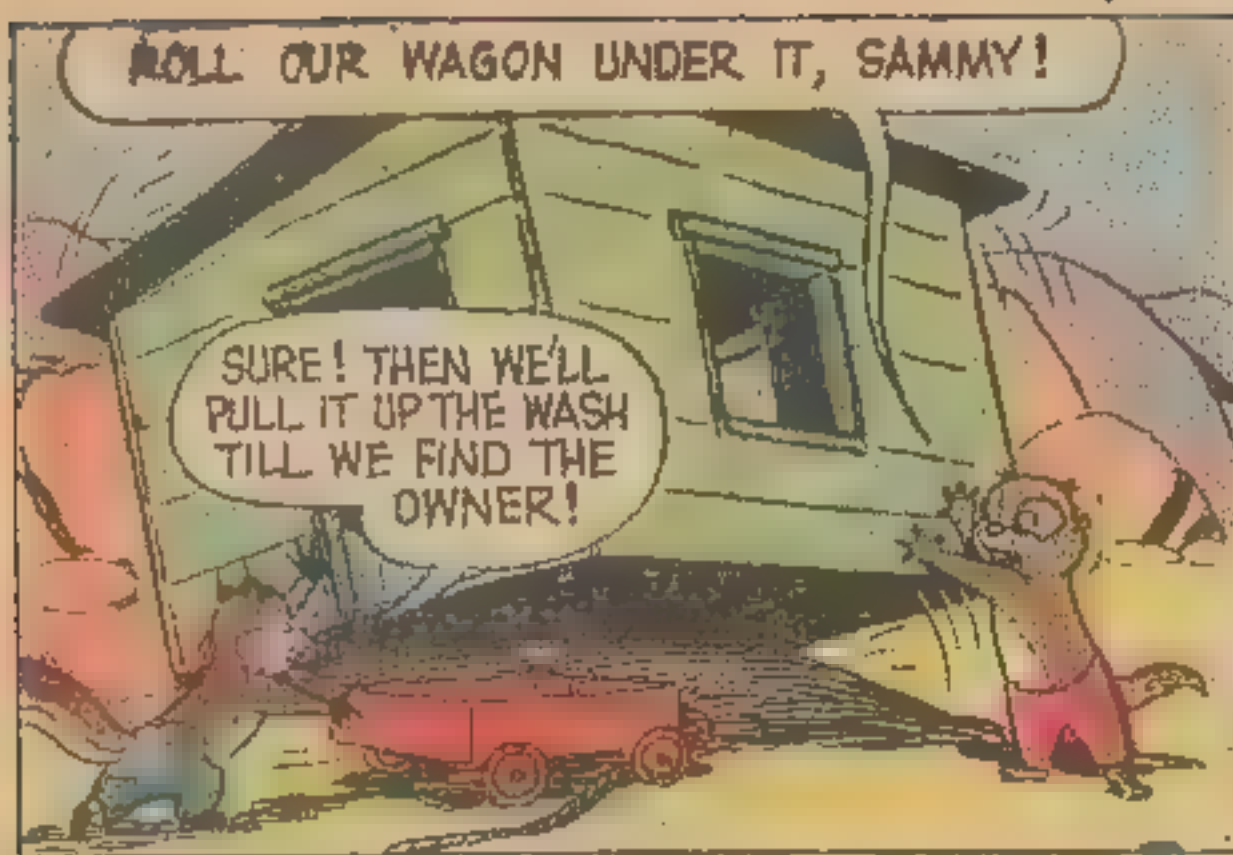

"Let's get out of here," Bertie said. "Here comes the owner of the kite now."

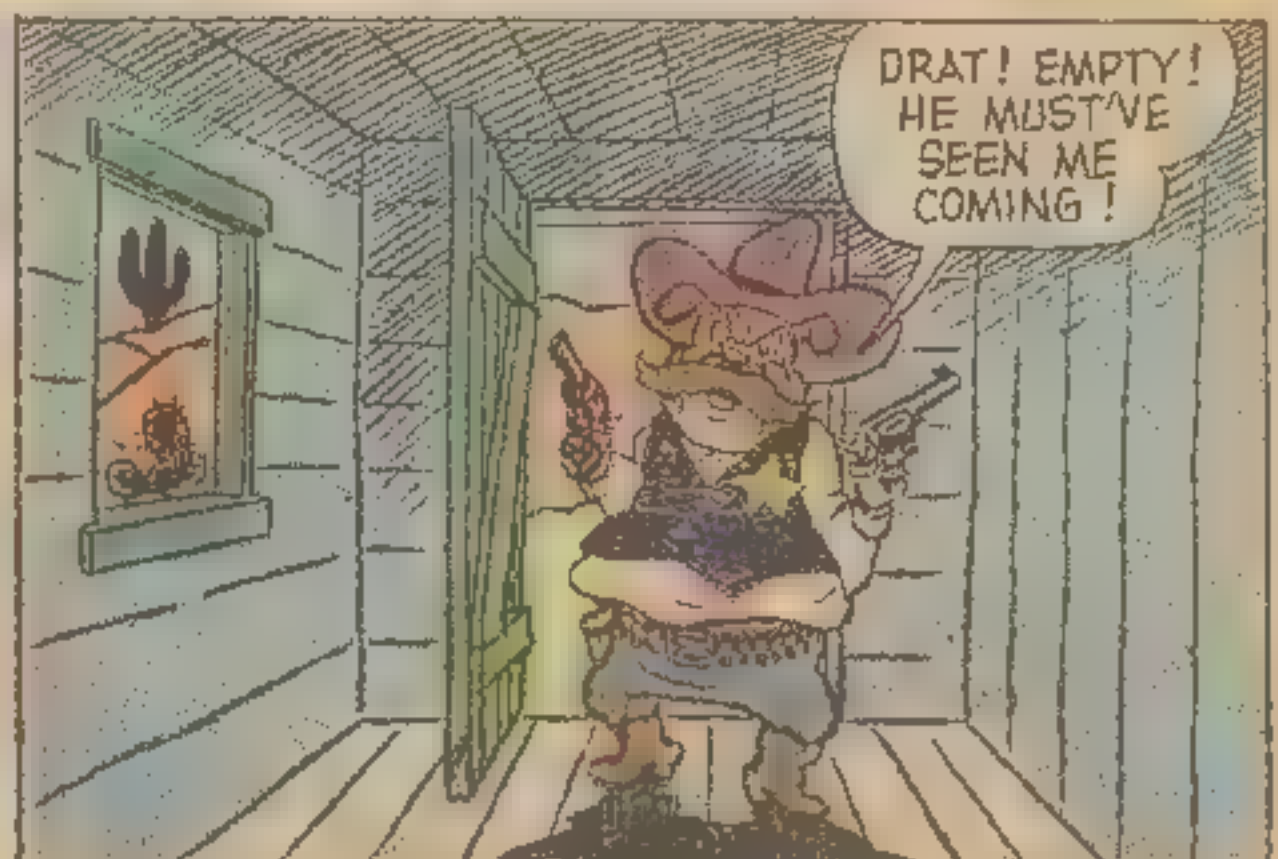

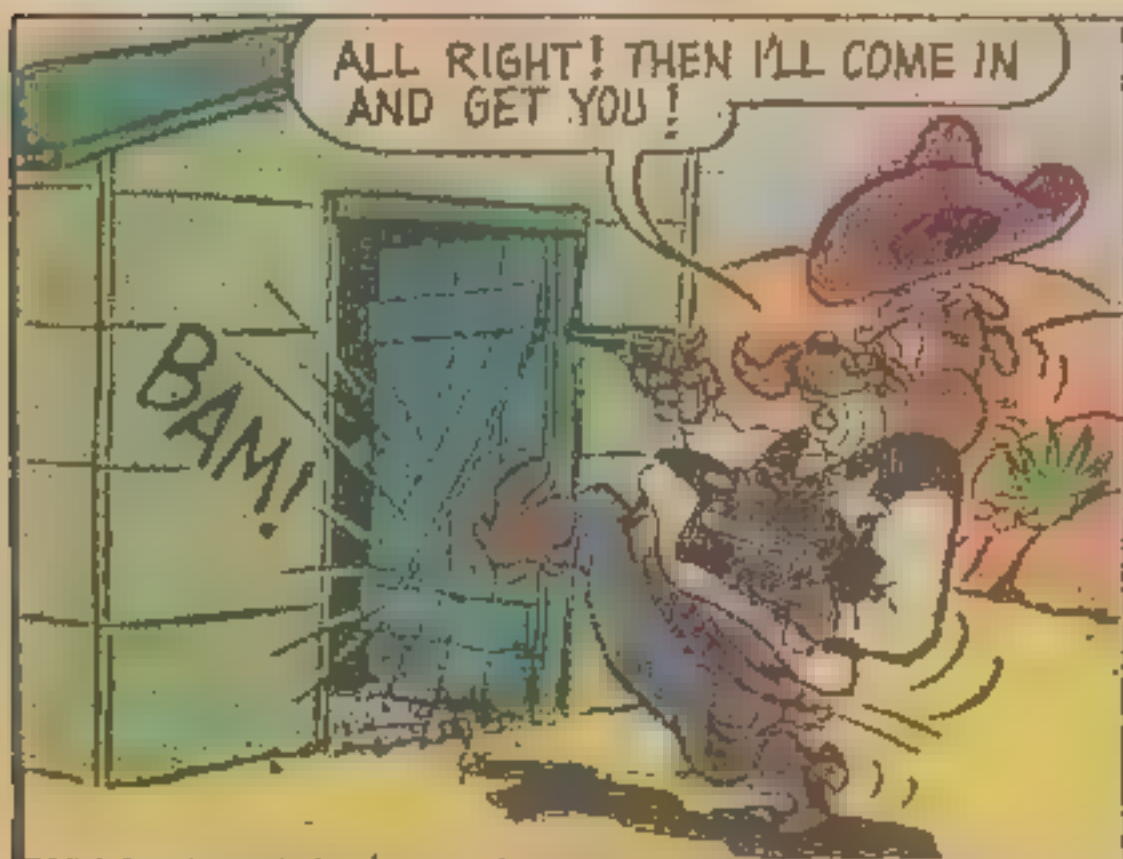

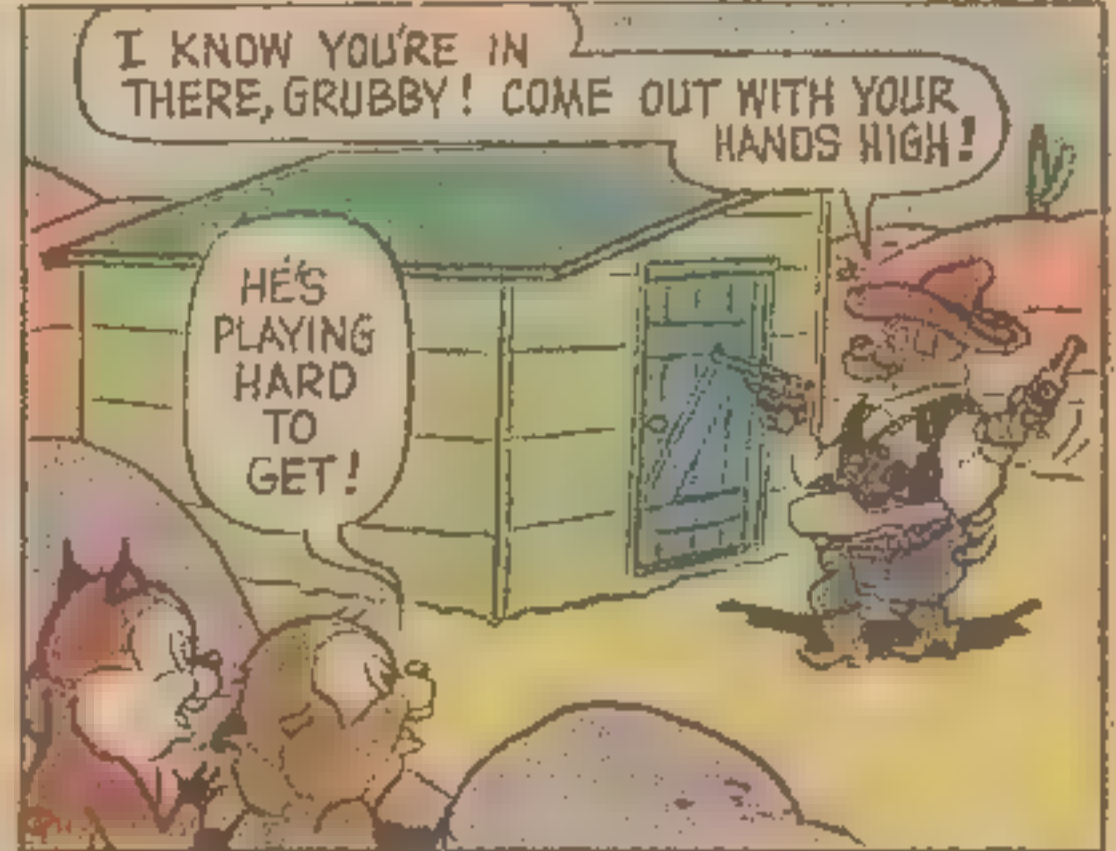

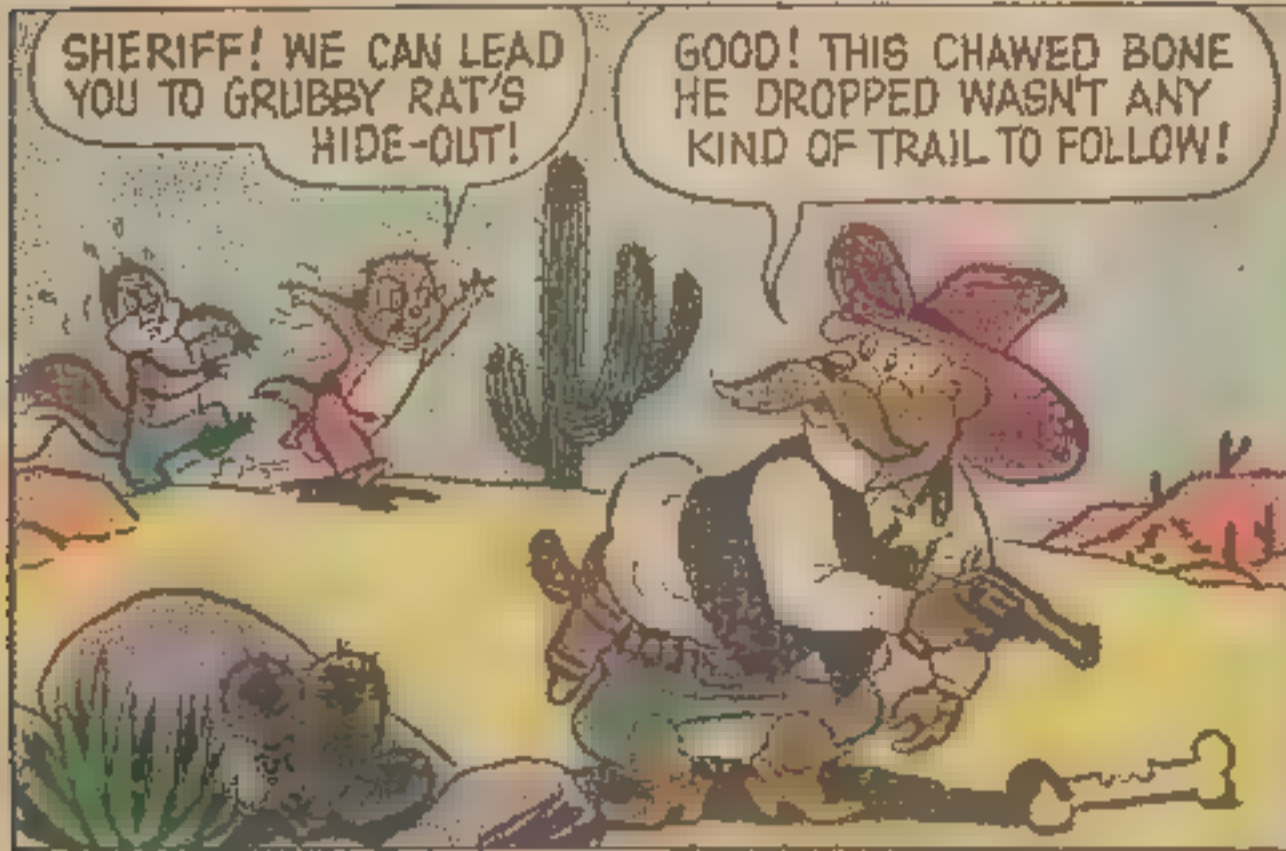

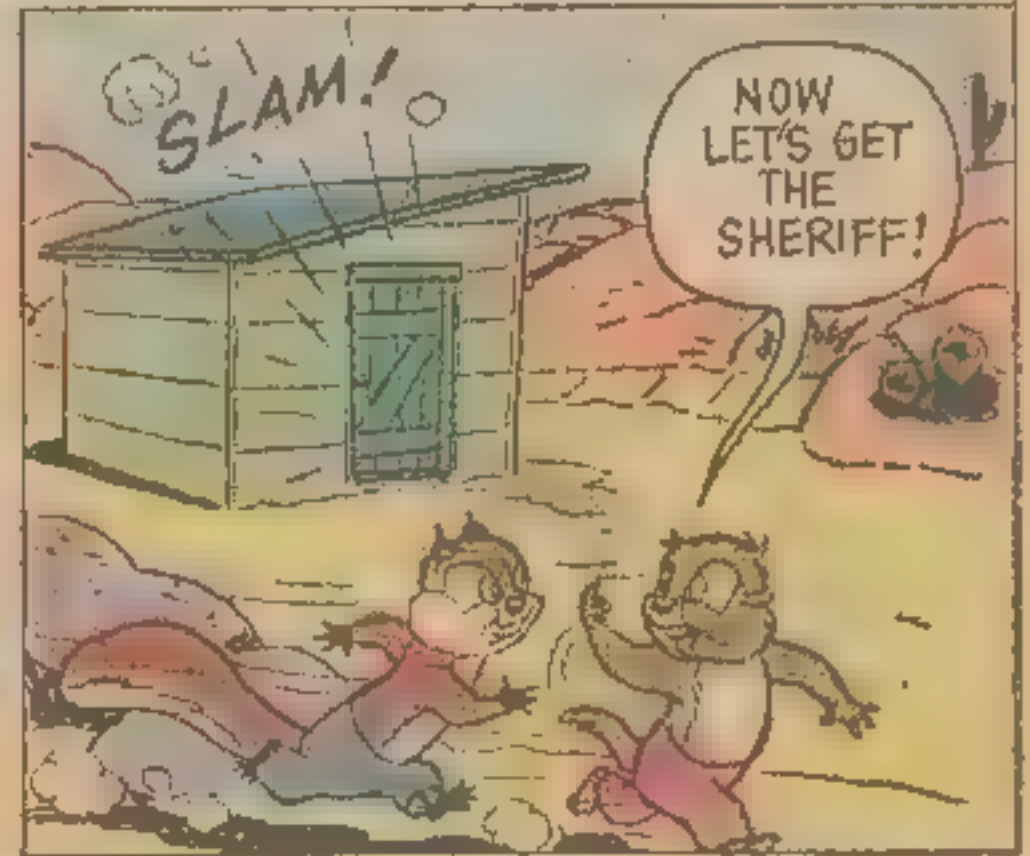

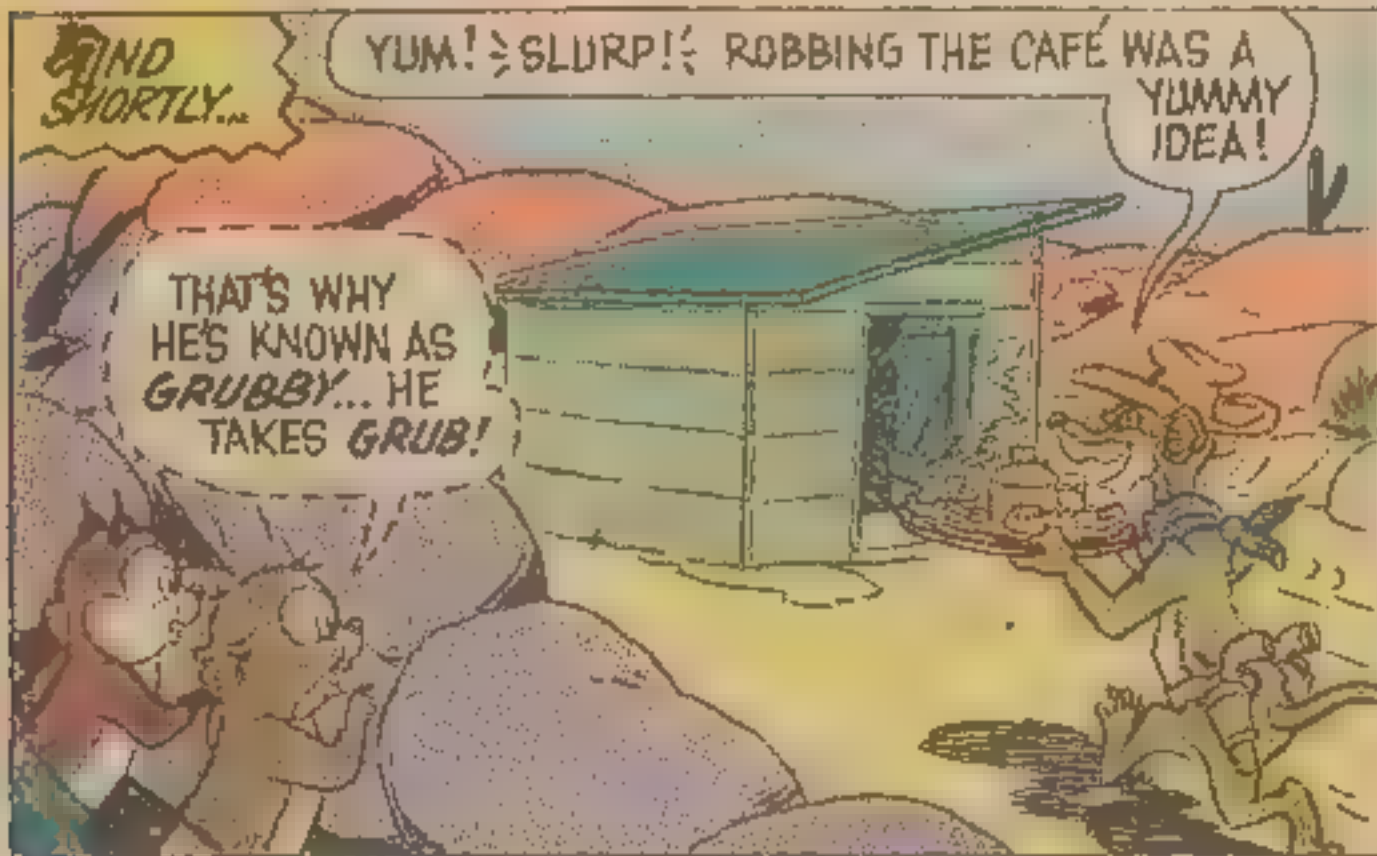

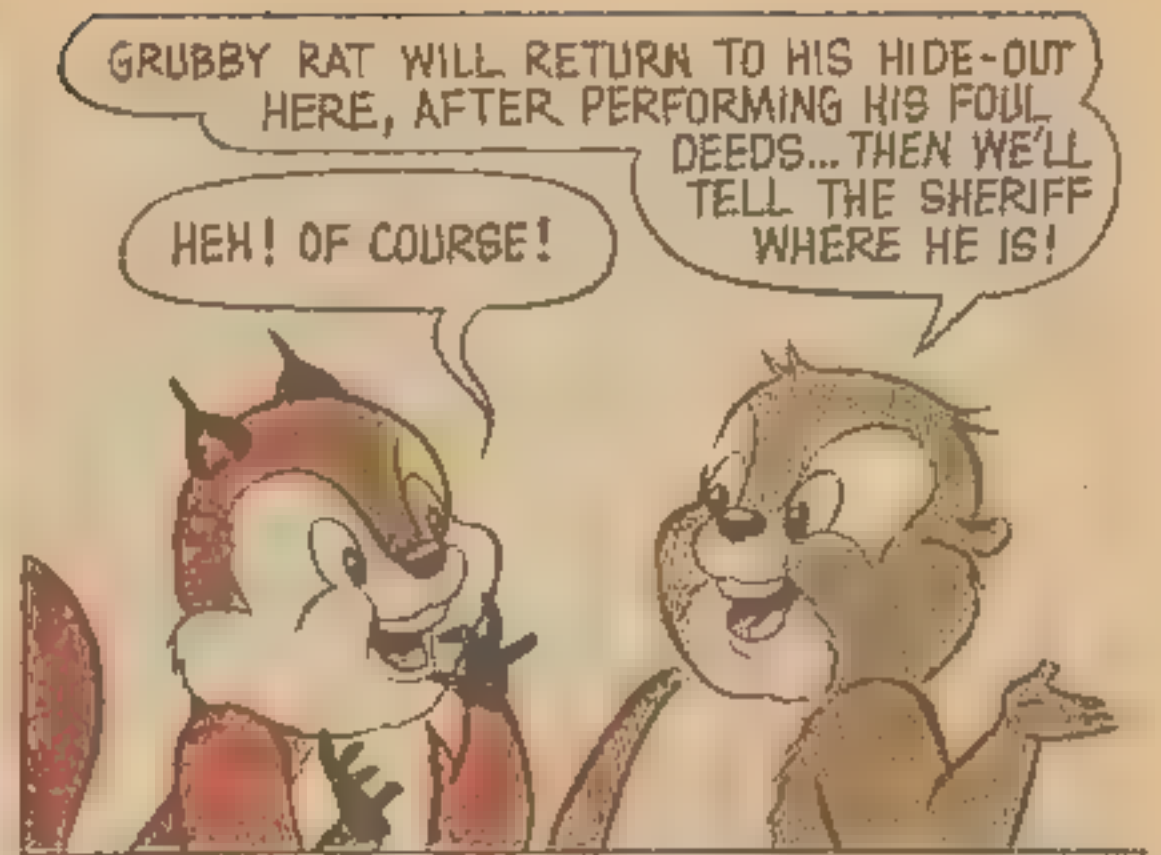

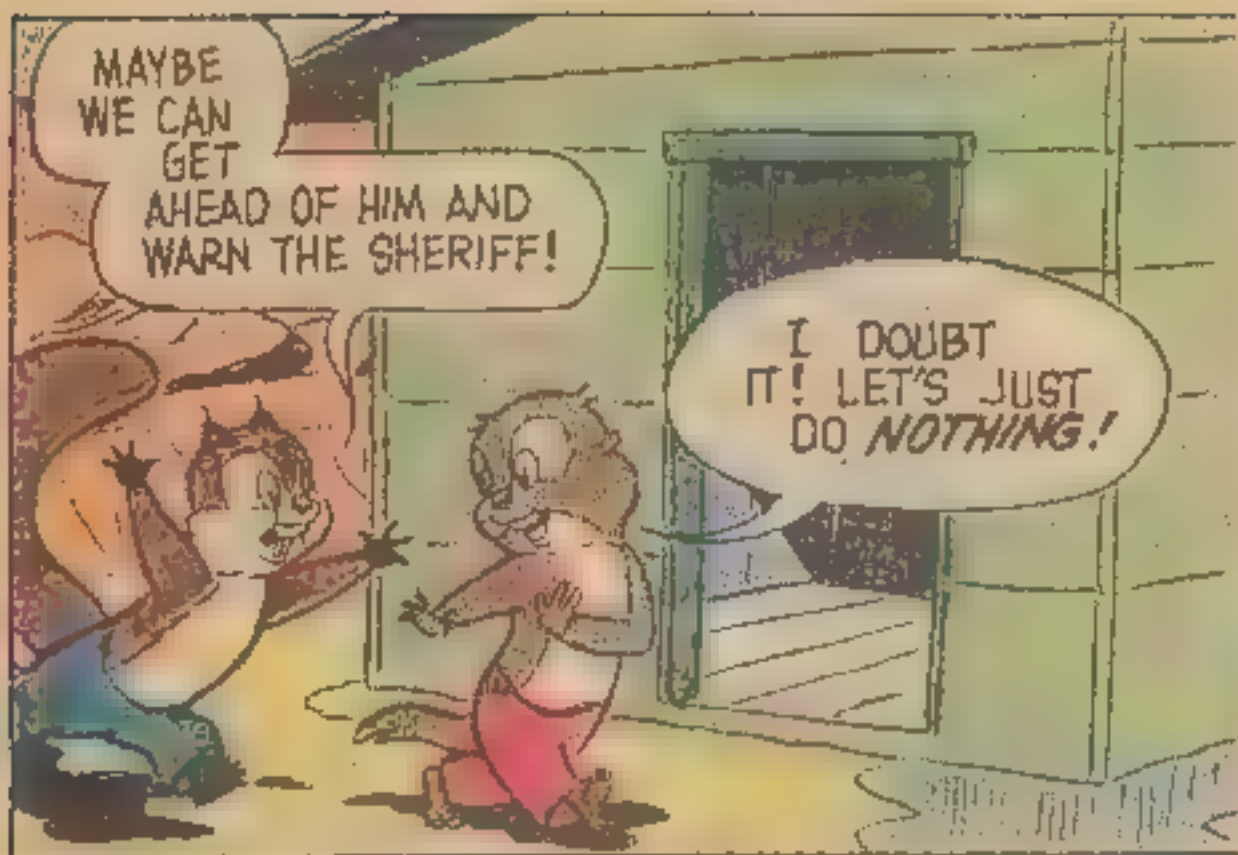

Later, back at the nest, Granny blinked her eyes and said, "My goodness, where did I ever get such a high-flying notion? I'm just lucky that I can thank my quick-thinking boys for bringing me back to earth!"
